

The Renowned HISTORY
[Or the LIFE and DEATH]
O F
Guy Earlof Warwick.

Containing his Noble EXPLOITS and VICTORIES.

The Epistle to R. R. R. R. R.

Courteous Reader, I have here undertaken to give you a full and satisfactory Account of the Life and Death of the far-Famed and Most Renowned English Champion, GUY Earl of WARWICK, according to what can be collected out of the best Historians, both Ancient and Modern ; no Work in this Nature ever yet appearing to the World with more than half a face, or an imperfect Relation, the which has rather fullied the Heroick Actions of so brave a Man, than caused them to shine in their Native Brightness, which was one of the Chief Causes that incited me to venture this vast Scene, which includes not only Europe, but a great part of Asia, e're it can be finished. Having ever had a Veneration for the Memorys of Worthy Men, I thought not fit to let such Lawrels wither in the Dust, as heretofore have flourished on the Brows of our Renowned Heroe, Englands greatest Boast, well knowing how great an Ingratitude it is, to let that Honour lye Buryed in silence, that the Nation has deserved so well : And above all, I consider there is no greater Spur to prick forwards the minds of men to undertake Great Designs and Valorous Exploits, than by Reading the worthy Deeds of such as have thereby attained to the height of Glory : For Stories of Battels and of War-like Enterprizes, if drawn to the Life, do most commonly (as it were) bear Fire in themselves, the which often so inflames the Souls of youth, that it stirs them up with a desire to imitate the same, and the very Remembrance inspires them with Courage, for the Soil of Man being composed of a fiery substance, (if not restrained by dulnes and gross Humours of the body) will be ever reaching after this Sublime, placed in more than ordinary Sphere, especially in English men, who at this day are famed for Courage and true Heroick Valour, through all the yet known World. No Nation under Heaven but in that must give us the prehemony, or we may justly claim it as our Birthrights. And now dear Country-men, since I have taken some small pains in drawing out this History, as near as possible, to the Life, I hope you will be so just to the memory of this Renowned Earl, as to Read over his War-like and Pious Actions, if not to imitate them, which is the only Wish of him who is a greater Admirer of True Worth. Your loving Country-man,

The A R G U M E N T.

How Guy Lineally descended from Cassibilanius the Famous British Prince, with a brief account of the Roman and Saxon Conquest over this Isle : Of Guys Birth and Parentage ; his youthful exploits, and first falling in love with Phælice, and what passed between them : How she sent him abroad to fight, having been admonished of his War-like Exploits in a Dream. How Guy landing in Normandy, killed two Champions, and grievously wounded the third, freeing a Lady, who was wrongfully condemned to dye. How he was pursued by Duke Philbertus, how he fought with him at Sea, and took him Prisoner : How he worsted all the German Princes, and won from them the Emperors Daughter ; he returning here to England, kills the monstrous Dan Cow : After being sent abroad, he kills Sixteen of Duke Ottos Men, who lay in a Wood to intercept his Life ; assists the Duke of Lovain, against Lorain, raises the Siege, with a dreadful overthrow ; afterwards makes peace, and with Two Thousand Men puts to Sea, in order to the Relief of Bizantium, besieged by the Turks, meets with several Pyrates, and destroys many of them ; raises the Siege, and kills many of the Pagan Champions, routing their Armies : Terry wounded, and his Lady taken from him, the which he restores, and assists his Father, Besieged by Duke Otton, whom he in single Combat killed ; Kills a Dragon and a Boar ; then returns to England, and kills another Dragon in Northumberland ; After that is Married ; then departs on Pilgrimage to the Holy Land ; Kills Amarant an huge Gyant, and delivers those that he kept in Tortures ; Routs Amanthus, and restores Earl Terry to his Earldome ; Returns to England, Combates Colbron the Danish Gyant, kills him, put the Armies to rout, freeing England ; Then lives in a Cave, unknown to all but the King ; At his death, sends Phælice his Ring, who coming to him, closed his Eyes, and shortly after dyes her self for grief ; Are splendidly buried in one Tomb, with an Epitaph infixed, and many other particulars more at large.

THE FAMOUS HISTORY O F GUY Earl of WARWICK.

C H A P. I.

A brief Narration of the Roman and Saxon Conquest made of this Isle, and of the miseries it endured; which brings us to the Birth and Lineal Descent of our famous Champion, the Heroick Earl.

When Rome had spread her Ensigns wide into the world, & made most Nations yield unto her Arms, France totally subdued some twenty years before our Saviours Birth: Cæsar, ambitious of more honour, from the distant shore, cast his eyes on this our British Isle, inclosed with white Rocks, (from whence most do affirm it took its name) and bounded with the Sea, then wild and barbarous, without Law or civil Customes; all painted people, and in manners strange. Yet the great Cæsar (fired with successful Fortune) regarding not the People, but the Land, desirous to annex it to his Conquests, and the Roman Empire, by reason of its temperate and pleasant situation, set sail from Callis with 200 Ships, thinking with his experienced Legions and old Soldiers trained in War, in a short space to over-run this Isle, then ignorant in seats of Arms, but ere he landed, found true British Valour, so beyond his expectation, that he stood amazed: for the Britains having notice of the Invasion, all assembled under their several Kings or Princes;

Gallibilain, a famous Briton, then being chief; from whom renowned Guy our famous English Champion sprung; they encountered the Romans so fiercely at their Landing that Cæsar himself was forced shamefully to retreat with the loss of his own sword, & several Ensigns and Standards were taken his Army broken, and he forced back to France, to make Recruits: Such was the Valour then our Nation bore, and at the first onset soiled proud Rome, to whose dread Arms the world their portion homage paid; nor did she make a Conquest here at last by the Sword, but after infinite loss and twenty years toyl, was forced to grant the Britains their own terms; the which was in the Reign of Augustus, about the time of our Saviour's birth, that Prince of peace, who established peace throughout the world: And for 400 years that the Roman Emperors by their Lieutenants Ruled this Isle, no Nation afforded more valiant & redoubted men, who were continually drawn out for to supply their Armies in most quarters of the world; till the red Rose went out to take peace from the Earth, & the Roman Empire was grown so great, that the

Bole

The Famous HISTOR Y of

Bale was not able to support the Branches ; whereupon the Goths & Vandals breaking into Italy, tore it in pieces, so that the Romans, to save their own nearer home, abandoned this Isle, and carried with them all the flower of British Chivalry ; upon which the Scots and Picts taking the advantage, overrun the Northern parts, destroying all with fire and sword so lamentably, that the distressed Britains were forced to call unto their aid the Saxons, a war-like people, that then flourished in Germany, which helped but to make their miseries the greater, for after they had subdued the British Enemies, they became worse Enemies themselves ; for Hingst and Horsus, these two Captains, observing the fruitfulness and pleasant situation of the Country, were loath to return to their own barren soil without good booties ; whereupon, and the better to create a quarrel, the former married his Daughter to Vortimor the British King (descended Lineally from the before mentioned assibilain) raised no small regret amongst the British Nobility, especially because through her means the Saxons were preferred to the chief Dignities, the which increased their interest, & got them firmer footing in the Land, of which they complaining to the King, & finding no redress, put some affronts upon the Saxon Chiefs, who glad of any opportunity to beget a quarrel, thereupon (as they pretended for want of their promised pay) seized several Towns wherein their Soldiers were quartered ; this alarm'd the Britains, who headed by the young Prince Vortimor's Son, overthrew them in a pitched Battel, though not without much slaughter on both sides : and after having driven them out of all their places of strength, obliged them to leave the Land ; but long they rested not content, for the next year having gathered a great Strength, they set sail for this Isle, the shores of which were so manfully defended against them, that they finding no possibility to land, desired a Truce, & that they might treat with the British Nobility about delivering them their Daughter ; the which after some debate was granted, & about sixty of the Saxons came on shore privately Armed, to treat with the like number of Britains, and in the midst of the treaty, every Saxon (as it was before contrived) slew his man, unless one who treated with (as some say) the Earl of Warwick, the Earl seeing the treachery, prevented him by pulling up an hedge-stake, with which he beat out his chains, & killed five or six more, himself getting away with only a slight wound in the left arm. The chief Nobility being thus murthered by treachery th: amazed Britains retreated, & gave the Saxons opportunity to land, the which they had no sooner done, but they fell to their old trade of laying all waste with fire & sword : the which they executed with such cruelty, as made the people flee before them to the Mountains (which are now called Wales, and are the real ancient Britains) leaving their houses, and what they could not carry or d iyc

GUY Earl of WARWICK.

drive away, to the ravage of the bloody Conquerors, who divided the Nation into seven parts, & named it an Heptarchy, each portion having a King over it, which continued so in civil Wars amongst themselves about three hundred years, till it was totally subdued by Edgard the great K. of the West Saxons, surnamed Athelstone, about the sixth year of whose Reign was the ever famous Champion Giraldus Caſſibilanus, vulgarly called Guy of Warwick, who as credible Historians do affirm, descended lineally from the British Royal blood, ever since Caſſibilanus the war-like Prince before recited, though the many changes and miseries of War clouded in obscurity, which now will be the Subject of this ensuing History; since we have already shewn you the miseries of cruel War, and the habery of British spirits, under such afflictions, and traced through the many adverse windings, the descent of our Hero, Englands chief glory, whose name will live while time shall be no more.

And still be founded by the trump of Fame,

Where e're the English Valour does proclaim.

C H A P. II.

How Guy descended from Caſſibilanus the Renowned British Prince; Of his Birth and youthful Exploits: And how he fell in love with Thalice the Earl's beautious Daughter, and how she despis'd his suit.

Guyraldus Caſſibilanus, Son of Gordian Caſſibilanus, (but more vulgarly known by the name of Guy of Warwick, by which name we must trace the history of his Life) born in the famous City of Warwick, in the sixth year of the Reign of Edgard the great, his father being an accomplished Gentleman, & had formerly a very good estate in Northumberland, which he was forced to part with to save his life, at the time of his being taken Prisoner, for bearing Arms under the subdued Saxon King of Mercia; upon which resignation obtaining his liberty from the Martial, in whose custody he was, he came to Warwick, & there so well behaved himself, that he won the affections and good liking of all the Gentry, but especially of Earl Robards, whar the King had made Governour of the Town and Castle, who took him into his house, & made him his Steward; in which place he behaved himself so well, that he won the affections of a Knights Daughter in the Town, which he married, and on her begat renowned Guy, the subject of this famous History, who might be said like Hercules from his very Infancy to be made for War, and great Exploits, being so well limbed from head to foot, as might denote a stout and war-like Hero would in time from that bold Infant rise; nay, and his Mothers dreams presaged no less: for during her pregnancy, she fancied that Mars descended in a bloody Chariot drawn by two fiery Dragons, & told her, her; that the Infant that her womb contained, should be the glory of this Nation, and so great in Arms renown'd, as should amaze mankind, and be the terror of the Pagan world. This she declared to the Countess of Warwick about a month before her delivery, which afterwards proved true, as shall amply be related: For no sooner had he attained to eight years of age, but he began to practise skill in wrastling, running, throwing stones, & other exercises that his tender years were capable of, in which he exceeded all that were much older and far bigger than himself, to the admiration of those that observed him more curiously: His delight was in hardships & laborious exercise, & so continued till sixteen, at which age few men could encounter with him, he then was used to enter the List, & wheresoever he came, alwaies came off with applause. In somuch, that the Earl bearing of his unmatched exploits, sent for him, and entertain'd him at dinner with himself and severall of the Gentry of that County, but above all Phelice his beautious daughter, Angel-bright, and with accomplished Graces fraught, on whom Guy fixing his youthful Eyes, immediately felt Loves Arrows wound his soul, and passion like a Fever burned within; still as he gazed, he felt new flames, and so unexpected a surprize, that all began to wonder at the sudden change; his Father demanded the cause, but could not get the secret from his breast, it stuck too close, yet after the sumptuous repast, he played several Prizes before the Earl, & being stung by Love, grew more fierce against his Combatants; or perhaps to shew the Lady his Valour, and to make her to have some esteem of his worth; so that at Whistling, Back-sword, Faulcheon, or the like, none were able to stand before him, for his force seemed more than man, and all that he struck or laid his hand upon, he felled or tumbled to the ground; so that at the last none durst encounter him: He seeing that, put on his Clothes, and going to the Earl, humbly desired his Licence to retire himself, as he pretended, for Refreshment; at which the Earl embracing him, said, Go thou worthy Youth, our Nations pride: and whih gave him a Ring set with Diamonds, as likewise several Nobie-men made him Presents, the which he unwillingly received, modestly excusing the appurtenances, and favours they had heaped upon him, saying, He was not worthy of them, and that his whole life's service must make them Restitution for those benefits he had received at their hands; which modesty made them yet commend him more, and have a greater esteem of his Virtues, and each was the more desirous of his company; but at his earnest request and the approach of night, they dismissed him, upon his promise to attend them the next day. After he was departed, and the Table sumptuously spread, Wine in abundance was called for, and supper no sooner ended, but the Earl began Guys Health, each of the Lords and Gentry then present pledging it with their Hats off. Such Fame got he by his prevailing manhood, after which round, the whole discourse was of his hopefulness, and the great Endowments that Nature and Art had conspired to bestow upon him: Guys Father was much joyed in his happy Son, &c.

The Famous HISTORY of

GUY Earl of WARWICK.

But now we must leave them in the midst of their Jollity, and follow Guy into his secret retirement, where being arrived, he began to contemplate upon what he had seen, and could hardly persuade himself that she was mortal, so far his fancy wrought upon her perfections, for indeed she was fair even to a Miracle, so that that Age afforded her no parallel; for eyes she had that glittered like two Stars, shaded with eye-brows pleasant to behold, a fair high Forehead, and cheeks as smooth as Alabaster, in which the Roses and the Lillies mixed so pure, that none could discern which had the superiority, her Teeth like Orient Pearls, inclosed with Coral Lips, & such a winning smile, as might ravish the beholder, with a smooth Chin transparent, whilst in curious wreaths her Golden Tresses hang ; to these add a Majestick grace, and comly mean ; to sum up all, Natures Masterpiece, the wonder of her sex. These considered, w^tackt poor Guy almost to despise of ever attaining such an accomplish'd creature, while thus he gives his passion vent : How am I lost for ever lost, in what a pathless maze is it I wander ? can Loves force be such to wound an heart that never injured his Deity ? but if it must be so, that it is thy sport (winged god) to wound us mortals with thy flaming shafts , let her in whose bright eyes thou satest when first thou wingedst them with her Glances, and darted them into my breast) feel an equal passion, or else it is Tyranny to torture one thou art not purposed to relieve : how am I wrapped in Clouds, not knowing where I am, so quickly snatched into the unknown Regions, where I cannot turn unto the right or to the left, but must either soar aloft, or fall into confusion, wild and ruinous, the latter is sure, if not prevented by the former : For me to attain that beatitude, lovely form divine, my sole-desire, I fear is altogether impossible, by reason of the infinite distance in our Fortunes, she so high, and I so mean and lo'v ; yet that my-thinks should not divide us ; Love is far more pure than Gold, and witness my wounds its force is irresistible : O ye powers ! for what are these created Beings, these softer Beauties, if not to be enjoyed ? or did ye send these Angelick shapes from your bright abodes, only to be gazed upon and wondred at by Love-sick man, and punish him by what he never must possess ? 'tis sure they were not nor can such lovely shapes lodge cruelty or proud disdain within their breasts, why then neglect I to declare my suit ? who knows but she may prove kind, or burn with equal flame, seeing her eyes bent equally w^t mine, and glance for glance she often sent, and now and then an Heavenly smile, which ended in a blush ; I'll be no longer tortur'd thus between hope and despair, but will go to her, & with low obdience tell her that I love, so receive my sentence of Life or Death from her fair Lips ; but alas ! how shall I do it, seeing I am unskilful in that grand affair ? list me then, thou god of Love, and send one of thy golden shafts before to make me roout and yield me successful in this bold attempt ; Virgin, I come, my Fever burns too fierce to be delayed.

The Famous HISTOR Y of

So saying, he stayed his language with a peal of sighs, strait arose from the solitary Bed whereon he lay, & in the best attire he had, posted to Warwick Castle, where he heard his Love was gone to recreate her self, but scarcely was he entred, e're he met the Earl w^t many of the Gentry, preparing for an hunting Match, all of them welcoming Guy, and desired his company, but he excused himself, by telling them he was much indisposseid, & so w^t much ado obtained his exemption of the Earl, who immediately sent for his Physician

G U T Earl of WARWICK.

cian, and gave him strict charge to be careful of his health and preservation : so the Earl to Hunting rode, and Guy was conducted to his Chamber, where the Physician made no small ado to inquire into the Nature of his Malady : but the more he sought, the more he found himself at a loss ; at which he perceiving Guy to smile disdainfully, (the better to save his credit) told him he must be dyeted, blooded, and keep his Chamber, or his distemper would grow worse ; to which Guy (rising from his seat) answered, Truly Father, at this time of your prescriptions, there's no need, nor can your Art afford the least relief, no Galen or Hypocrates themselves, were they alive and both here present, could not give me ease ; 'tis my self must be my own Physician, or my Malady must reign for ever over me : There is a flower as I have lately heard of precious worth, growing in this Castle, the which could I once pluck, would ease me in a moment ; at which the Doctor stood in admiration, wondering what flower he meant, why truly sir, said he, 'tis called Happy ; Indeed (qd. the Doctor) Happiness is good ; but as for a flower of that name, in all my curious search I never found nor heard of : Pray sir, said Guy, leave me, and I fear not but to find it out, for I am sure it grows within these walls ; at which the Doctor took his leave, and Guy ascended up the Castle stairs to view the prospect of the Gardens round, into which he had no sooner cast his Eyes, but he beheld the beauteous maid that was sole Empress of his heart, sitting alone in a shady Bower, to screen her from the Suns hot Rays, while before her the springing water of a Cristal Fountain played, and sent refreshment to each fragrant flower or lovely plant that crowned the happy place, resembling another Paradise, and she the first-created woman ; these Guy takes as happy Omens, & resolves to venture now for life or death, & thus invokes Deity to aid him in the great design. Oh propitious power, if ever, now prove kind in aiding thine humble suppliant, who in all obedience unto thy commands, pays his unspotted bows at thy great Altar, which ever blazes bright with flaming hearts of Lovers, offered up as Trophies of thy power ; assist me to court this famous Beauty, and teach me how to wooe & how to conquer her who has already conquered me. So saying, he descended with all speed, & coming to the Garden gate, knocked softly, and soon found admittance, by one of the Damosels that waited on fair Phælice, the which he no sooner had, but composing his War-like face into the best form he could, he made toward her with low reverence, who (expecting he came from her Father) rose up to meet him, when Guy with Love surcharged, thus began.

Fairest of Creatures, brightest of your Sex, made of such Kirdred-mould to Heav'n, that you seem Angelical, a goddess all divine ; therefore I have here brought an Heart by Loves command, to offer at your shrine ; O frown not on me with disdainful eyes, least with such a look death enter and destroy the man that ever shall admire, & with this awful distance adore your matchless Virtues ; despise me not, thou only center of my soul, who loves thee more than Life. O that I could express my Boundless Passion, or that thou couldst look into my breast, and there behold how the tormenting flames still roal about my heart, that with a constant fever burns, in which the Arrows of your pointed Beauty stick ; That Lords and Noblemen have courted you I am not ignorant, but none could like me ; pardon my boldness Lady, that to save my Life I sue with the same fear a guilty Prisoner beholds his angry Judge ; for your Power's far greater when Life or Death depends upon your smiles or frowns.

The Famous HISTOR Y of

To whom thus Phælice with majestic countenance replied : Alas sir, Love is such a childish toy, I ne'r intend to try it, therefore cease your vain suit, a Virgins happy life shall be my choice for ever ; Love is but a Dream, composed of idle fancies, and that I should wound you is impossible, or if such it could be, you then must blame your rash and unadvised folly, to attempt things so far above your reach ; could you imagine that the Heir of Aquæwick would e're condescend to Marry with one so far beneath in birth, and in each degree unfit, no ; therefore I would advise you to desist this enterprise, least it come unto my fathers ear, and beget thee sharp rebuke.

So saying, she ended, and Guy prepared to answer, but she turned away disdainfully, and left him to himself now hopeless, perplexed and tormented worse than ever.

Cursing the cruel Stars that rul'd his birth,
And wishing now to be no more on Earth.

C H A P. III.

How Guy being denied, fell distracted for a time, till Cupid representing him in a War-like posture, and declaring what wonders should be wrought by him, to Phælice in her sleep, telling her it was his Mother's command that she should love him, whereupon she granted her consent upon condition of his performing glorious Enterprizes.

H alf distracted with what had passed, Guy retires to his Fathers house, thinking to shake off the Chains of Love, or burst them by some other means ; for like Hercules's poison'd shirt, the more he strove, the more he was vexed, and the distemper followed him wheresoever he went, for which he finding no relief, grew franticke for a time, quite bereft of sense or reason, and to this purpose uttered his phrenes & ran into disorder far beyond Orlando or Orestes. Am I then slighted (said he) who evermore will trust to woman-kind ? accursed cruel Love, couldst thou leave me thus ? can she not love, or loves loves me some one else, which hinders her love from passing unto me ? O that I knew my Rival, my dread Arm should hurl such Vengeance on his head, as should amaze mankind ; I'd drag him round the World, o're Sea and Land, and buri him into circling fires, plunge him into roaring Erebus, there to broyl in Brimstone flames and scorched for ever. O Jove ! Jove ! I'le to thy Courts and hollow loud, nay, I will thunder to your regardless power, and make you deaf with everlasting crys, from the Suns-bright Chariot snatch Aetherial fire, set your Celestial Mansions in a blaze, melt down your golden Roofs, and make your gates of Admant fly from off your Diamond hinges, arm my self wi h Lightning, and make vollied thunders roar around the World ; Catus, Mincs, Rodemantus, and all the black Infernal Powers, what have ye done ? my Love she's lost, for ever gone : Sink, sink Earths Frame to thy first Chae, and with thy ruine crush mankind : Drop, drop, ye Stars, and ever wakeful Tapers of the Skies, and let combustive flames purge this groser World ; O she's gone, the Beauty's gone, now night and darkness seize me, and eternal slumbers seal my e/yes.

GUY Earl of WARWICK.

Thus saying, he groan'd and smote his breast, pull'd off his Hair, and in distracted sort continued, till Phelice being admonished by Cupid in a Dream, sent him more comfortable hopes of her ensuing favours.

When nig t had drawn her Curtain, and the World in silence late , each Mortal in sweet slumbers was reposed, Morpheus the Leaden god of Sleep from his drowie Cave, by Venus command, roused up his Visionary forms, the whiche in various shapes present themselves to men, and one of the Farys vest in Cupids wonted guise, with Bow and Quiver, arm'd, presents it to the fancy of the slumbering Phelice, to whom the shade (being instructed) thus began.

Phelice behold, I from the Queen of Love my beau ious Mother, came to Present unto thee this Martial Hero ; and with that a shade all clad in Armoir appeared, representing Guy so to the life, that she knew him at first, & started in her slee, whiche thus the wing'd form proceeded : This is the man design'd for thee, whose War-like deeds shall make the world amazed, and to such fame shall soon arise, that Kings and Princes shall be Proud to court him, whilst the terroure of his Arm shall spread over most part of the Earth ; a friend to the distressed, and the oppressors foe ; Fortune shall wait on him, and conquering Laurels shall be green upon his brows : Despise him not fair Virgin for want of wealth, it is the treasure of the mind that makes a man truly great ; for know, Beauty was first created free, e're Gold was known or from the bowels of the earth was brought to light, and since it has been in estimation, it has corrupted innocence, and vertue spoiled, therefore is to

The Famous HISTORY of

to be despised in case of Love, that intellectual Essence and bright Jewel of the Soul ; then as the Powers above decree, take him for his manhood and accomplished virtues, think him worthy of your love, even at the highest rate for it is most assured he is so.

So said, the Form and Cupid that was not wanting in the Enterprise, drew up his Bow charged with a golden shaft, and aimed directly at Phælic heart, the which he no sooner did, but swift as Lightning flew the singing Arrow through the yielding Air, and fixed its point direct, at which the starting Virgin awaked, and wondred to find a fire so quickly kindled in her breast, so that contemplating on the Vision, thus began to sigh out her passion.

Alas ! and art thou gone thou winged power, what change is this I feel. I that so late despised all Love, and laughed at Lovers pains, now feel a fever in my breast that will consume me if it get not vent ; can it be Cupid that I must

GUY Earl of WARWICK.

most love, my fathers Stewards son, that I denied ? must I now sue to him ? perhaps he will despise me for neglecting him, and triumph over my weakness : O Cupid, are thy Laws then so severe ? pardon my offence, and I'll hereafter grow more mild, and pity Lovers in distress.

While she was thus strugling with her flame Guy having recovered his senses, resolved not to Retreat like a Cowheart, but rally once more, and try his fortune , and after some search, having found her in her Chamber he thus begins.

Most beautious, tho' severe, to you once more I have presumed to come, not as a Saitor now, but as a condemned Prisoner, desiring you to strike the fatal stroke, that can only set my soul at rest, for I have born my torture long enough ; no Tyrant Love I can indure no more ; therefore sweet Lady pity a wounded Lover, if any pitty lodges in that fair breast, strike deeper, yet at last prove kind and ease my pain. So saying, he sighed, & tears burst from his War-like eyes, not knowing that the powerful god of Love had mollified her heart, and made her sensible of his command, &c.

The which Phelice observing, began to blush, whilst in her fair cheeks the Roses conquest over the Lillies gained ; then letting an undiscovered sigh, began as followeth : Alas ! you ask what is not mine to grant ; Know gentle yoath, I at my fathers disposal am, nor without him dare I consent to ought, for should I now prove disobedient, who so long have been obedient to his just commands, what would the world of Phelice say ? each tongue would wound my fine so deep, that nought but death could yie'd relief ; nor should I so escape, for in the silent Grive they would asperse me, and fix Reproach upon my Tom'. To which thus answered Guy : Fair Ldy, doubt not your Fathers free consent, for with this Arm I will so far purchase the good esteem of the Renowned Ea. i, that my matchless deeds, instead of Gold , shall win his greatness to accept of me your humble slave for his obedient Son. So ended he, and she inflamed with love, yet willing to hide it for a time, began : Go then, and in fierce Arms your fame advance, court dreadfull Battels while Victoria crowns your head with her Triumphant Lawrels, and when laden with the spoiles of War, or great Atchievements, you return, that I may safely yield without a stain to Honour, I shall be all your own, till then I shall remain in Virgin-state your constant Phelice for ever.

At which Guy overjoyed, with humble thanks bowed low as Earth, and at last through the excess, his Language found a passage, while these words he uttered : Bright Star, by whose divine Influence my soul is guided and disposed ; If feats of Arms, greatness in Battel gained , will please my Love, through Seas of blood I'll wade, climb to the highest Turret of Fames brazen

Tower,

The Famous HISTORY of

Tower, and from thence look down upon the Cowheart world, with Oh for Cesar now, or the dread Conqueror of the East, I feel new force, and on a suoden am grown more than man, i'm all on fire, till my great Task's begun, and for a time I willingly forgo thy beautious face, which ne'rtheless shall be for ever stamped upon my soul; my Love farewell, to Arms I must repair; for this sweet kisst that I imprint upon thy Coral Lips, i'lle write thy name in Crimson characters, upon the breasts of Earths proud Champions, that when they see them they may think of thee.

Again farewell my Love, I must away,
To find the Coast where glory baits to day.

C H A P. IV.

How Guy putting to Sea, landed in Normandy, where he fought with three Champions, killing two of them, and wounded the third, taking from them a Lady, wrongfully condemned to dye, by the young Duke of Bilois, who had ravish't her.

Now Guy having taken his leate of Phelice, prepares for France, & imbarquing, set sail, with promise of quick arrival there, but no sooner was the Ship come ten Leagues off from shore, but the winds began to blow hard from the South-West, and black Clouds overspread the face of Heaven, & loud Thunders from the Northern round began to roare, so that in short time a dreadful storm arose, while Lightning darted thick, and made the Seas seem all on fire, the waves enraged by the winds, mounted high, and seem'd to mix with pitchy Clouds, and handied the Ship from side to side, so that they tode on furiously before the Gusts all that day and all the following night, not so much as having the Prospect of Sun, Moon, or Star but early the next morning, the Mariners from the Top-mast head descreyed Land, to which (the winds being somewhat abated) they made; and about ten in the morning found it to be Harleu in Normandy, where they put in safe: after an hours continuance in the Port, Guy and the Captain of the Tessel went on shore to refresh themselves, where they had not long been, ere they heard loud shouts and the noise of Drums and Trumpets, the which was most ex-ceptable to Guy, for now he thought there was some work for him in hand, whereupon he called his Host, & with countenance sad (which shewed a sense of grief) told him that a beautious young Lady of that place, Dorinda by name, having been lately ravished by one of the Duke Bilois's Sons, the which black Crime, because she accused him of, she was committed by the Duke his Father to Pyllon, who was then Gouvernour of that place, & by reason he could bring no pceoff of the crime, some Ruffians were suborned to swear that the fact was done by some other person, and that he had confessed the same laid it upon the young Lord to hinder his Marriage, in revenge for breaking his promise that he pretended he had made to her ; upon which the old Duke grew so incensed, by reason his Son was in a short time to be married to the Princess of Parma, that he condemned her to be burnt, unless any Chamberlain would be so kind as to vindicate her innocencie by fighting bout for her distinction after another ; this news was welcome unto Guy, as hoping now to try his first Experiment, so that turning from his back to the Captain, he said Sir, I think this Enterprize is worthy of an Englishman, and that wronged Beauty ought not to be left thus in diff'rence ; per'ly the nobles for' in it, & always those that are willing to venture their all for the hand, and so the innocent must perish, whilst the guilty must go free : What say you Captain (said Guy) if I adventure to preserve her ? Truly (said the Captain) I think it a meritorious Exploit, could you atchieve it with safety, but I hold it no wisdom to hazard your life for the sake of a stranger whom you never saw. Truly (said Guy) I left my Native soyl for that intent ; my busyness is only to win Fame at the hazard of my life and Fortune, to help the Weak against the Mighty, and to relieve those that oppressing Tyrants crush. So saying, he gave order for his Horse and Arms strait to be brought on shoyre, so accoutring himself in his War-like Habiliments, he took leave of his Host and the Captain, who indeavoured all they could to perswade him from the Enterprize, but in vain ; for having desired the Captain who would willingly have accompanied him to wait his return, he set Spars to his Horse, & riding to the place where his Host had dissected him, he found a great concourse of people standing round in a Ring made by the Marshal so appointed, in the middle of which was fastned to a stake the fair Dorinda, and by her stood her weeping frrends, on whom Guy fixing his eyes, was moved to pitty, & more eager to vindicate her with his Arms, the which he had scarce time to think upon, before the Russins (who had accused the Lady) entred the List, well mounted, and well armed, proudly wheeling to the Right and Left, and then making a stand, one of them with a loud voice, demanded who among the Assembly there present it was that durst, in behalf of that base woman, (pointing to the disconsolate Lady) enter the list, for (says he) although the Dukes pleasure is that he shall combat with us four, yet I alone stand ready to receive him on my Launces point, and in death make him repent the undertaking of a Strumpets cause, while these my companions have no work left to do : This made Guy storn, so that his countenance to terror changed, whereupon he bid make way, and with an undaunted courage entring, thus spake : See here presumptuous man a Champion that dares vindicate this ladies cause, and prove her innocent, not singly with one will I dispute, but with you all at once to have the sooner done ; this so enraged the French-man, that instantly he bid the signal Trumpet sound, at which both couched their spears and as swift as lightning in the midway met, whilst the horses thundering hoofs made earth beneath them tremble, Guy's Spear came plum upon the other shread, and through his Armour and his shirt of Haile a passage found, and quite through his body rush'd, so that down he fell, and with a groan expired ; the other thre seeing their Companion thus serv'd, charged all three with desperate fury upon Guy's high-prick'd Arms, vowing revenge, the which Guy not long induring, drew out his Mally blade, which like a Comet portendeth death and dismal fate, and after having brandished it, began to hew upon upon his Combatants so dreadfully, that at every blow their Armour piecemeal fell to the ground, and afterwards their mangled limbs, so that two of them immediately fell dead, and the other wounded, on his knees begged life, confessing the whole intreague, how they had been hired to accuse the Lady, & that Philbertus the Dukes son was really guilty, and had hired them for 1000 Crowns to do what they had done ; at which an universal shout arose, each praising and applauding Guy, and accusing the Duke, calling him Tyrant, each inquiring whs the stranger was that had wrought so great a deliverance to the distressed Lady, and with all imaginable joy expressed their thanks ; Guy being rid of his foes, went to the Lady and unbound her, and delivered her to her friends, who embraced his knees, and weeping for joy, imployed ten thousand blessings on his head, offering him Gold Pearls and Diamonds, but he refused them all, and only desiring them to provide for the Ladies safety, by conveying her out of the Dukes power, least he being exasperated, upon his being informed what had passed, should devise some other means to put her to death in his absence ; so taking his leave, he departed to the Ship, & there related what had hapned to his friends who with no little joy gave attention to what he said, yet after some consult, it was not thought safe to stay in that Harbour any longer, but weighing their Anchors, they set sail.

G U Y Earl of WARWICK.

The Famous HISTOR Y of

GUY Earl of WARWICK.

C H A P. V.

How Philbertus the young Duke, having notice what Guy had done, pursued him by Sea, and of a dreadful fight that hapned between them, wherein the Duke and his men were taken Prisoners.

PHilbertus having notice what had passed, how one Guy an English man had slain three of his Champions, and mortally wounded the fourth, and that his treachery was discovered, the Lady Dorinda freed and conveyed away he knew not where, it so enraged him, that he quaked with ire, & vowed the bloodiest vengeance upon Guy that tortures could inflict, nor delayed he, but without his Fathers knowldg caused his servants and attendants in number sixty, to arm themselves, and straitway hasted to the Port where he had notice Guy's Ship lay, but no sooner arriving there, but he understood that they set sail some three hours before his coming, the which made him yet more eager, as thinking Guy fled for fear of him, and that Dorinda was by him conveyed away, so that going on board a stout Vessel that lay in the Port aforesaid, he commanded to weigh Anchor, and make all the sail they could after the English Ship, whom by a small Boat they understood was sailed to the

The Famous HISTORY of

Fallward; the Marriners obeyed, and having a soze wind and a light sayle in six hours space they came within sight of the ship wherein Guy was, which bearing but halfe her sails, rode softly on, no sooner the French ship came in sight, but the Marriners advertized their Captain of it, who with a Prespective took an observation, and assured Guy that they were pursued, and that their foes were cribble in number, telling him that the best way for security was to hoist up all the sails, and if possible to out-strip them, the which if they could do till Evening, he feared not but by the help of the night to get clear of them; why (said Guy) howe many ships have us in chace? Truly, said the Captain, I discern but one, yet that one carries thrice the men on board her than we have; 'Tis no matter, said Guy, Captain be of good courage, I swear I would not for the Crown of France have it reported that Guy ever fled; no, tack about, and let us meet them like courageous English Souldiers, my self alone will bear the bynt of War, whilst you (if you please) may stand and see faire fair play ; this speech so incouraged the Sea-men, that they cryed, let us in gage them strait, and the Captain, now half ashamed, was no less willing, so that they had no sooner put themselves into a posture, but the Ship in which the French Lord was, bore up the by side, and without any more ado grapted with the English, which made Guy smile, whildest like Mars he stood upon the Deck, brandishing his dreadfull sword ; the French endeavoured to board the Vessel, which Guy gave order to permit without much difficulty ; so that they thinking themselves victorios, gave such a shout as made the Ocean ring ; Say, now (qj. Guy) you have awaken'd me, look to it, for this rudeness some or most of you shall sleep until the day of doom ; with that he began to lay about him with more than humane force, whilist Arms, and Heads, and dead men covered all the place whereon he fought, for against his sword no Armour coulde defend, but at each blow fresh streams of blood ran down, Philbertus seeing such havock of his Souldiers made, offered those few that were left alive to retreat if possible to his Ship, and imediately endeavoured to ungrapple, which Guy (having cleared his Deck) perceiving, leap'd on board the French Ship, and alone for half an hour maintained the fight with such fury, that many of them leaped into the sea, he so abord his sword ; the which Philbertus seeing, encouraged his men to do so, and as a man grown desperate with despacte charged upon him with such force as made it sparkle fire, at which Guy no whit daunted, but smot him such a blow as made him fall for dead at his feet, whilist the Souldiers seeing, cryed for quarter and threw down their Arms ; Guy who was alwaies merciful to the submissive, bid cease the Battel, in which space Philbertus came to himself, & with a low submission begged his life, which Guy as freely granted ; and after having transported him and the rest that were left alive into his own Ship, he set fire to the other ; and sailing onwards of his intended Course, coasting the Compas till they touched on that part of Normandy that borders on the German Empire, where Guy (nothing daunted) landed ; the which no sooner done, but he hears that a great Tilt and Turnament was to be held for Blanch the Emperors Daughter, a most beauteous and accomplished Lady, and whosoever carried the day, was to have the Lady in marriage, and with her a brace of Grey hounds, a Falcon, and a milk-white Steed ; upon this welcome news Guy discharged the Captain of the Vessel, leaving him with the Prisoners, whi put them to their Ransome, and rode to the place designed for the noble strife.

GUY Earl of WARWICK.

Where Honour baited, there his Arms to try,
And pluck a Plume from full-fleg'd Victory.

The Famous HISTOR Y of

C H A P. VI.

How Guy worsted all the German Princes, and won fair Blanch the Emperors Daughter, who he afterwards left and departed for England.

Guy having taken his leave of his old friend the Captain, rode to the place designed for the stage of Fortune, and the winning of the beauteous Prize, to which he was lead by the loud sound of the Trumpets, Clarions, Flutes, and all manner of War-like Musick ; where no sooner arriving, but he beheld the Plain filled with Horses, and Chariots, and Armed Kts. whose Coats of Armes and Streamers of Gold played with the winds, and their bright Armour and glittering Spears, with the reflection of the Sunbeams

GUY Earl of WARWICK.

beams, made the place seem all on flame ; a glorious sight for to behold, for most of the Christian Princes and Chivalours Knights were there assembled with their splendid retinues, thinking the prize well worth their strife, each being ambitious of the honour to be called the Emperors Son, and over and above to gain the fairest creature that they e're beheld ; Guy was no sooner settled in his station, but the Trumpets sound the Charge, whereupon Prince Philanus a German by birth, entred the List on his proud Steed, who champing his silver Bit, scarcely induced the Reins ; against him Earl Spartanus came, and both couching their Launces, as swift as Lightning met, and with such force, that the splinters of their broken Launces flew around their heads, then drawing out their glittering swords, they furiously ingaged, till by a blow the Earl received on his Helm, his eyes grew dizzy, and his sword dropped from his hand, himself down from his horse fell on the ground, which Guy seeing, grew impatient of delay, and letting Spurs to his bounding Steed, he came up to the Prince, now proud of his late success, and laying by their Spears, they charged upon each other with their swords, but e're they had exchanged many blows, Guy's trusty sword fell with redoubled force (much like a Thunderbolt) upon the German's head, and breaking his helm bruised him so, that down he fell intranced, & thence was carryed off for dead upon his Shield ; to revenge which disgrace, done to his friend, Otto the great Duke of Tuskany proudly entred wowing that Guy should perish by his hand, and no less than his life should be sufficient to appease his fury ; at which Guy smiling, sustained his first Charge without much resistance, but at the second met him with such a blow as cut quite through his Armour and his shirt of Mail, so that from the gaping wound the blood streamed fast, which the Duke eager of revenge regarded not, till fainting, he fell upon the ground, and had not his blood been stayed, he had there bled his last : Duke Rayner next came forth and bid defiance unto Guy, saying, Presumptuous Knight, this Lady must be mine, nor shall that Armour guard thy breast from death, since Armed with Love and powerful Steel I fight ; he had no sooner said, but Guy undaunted met him stroke for stroke, so that blows like Hail fell thick, and thundered on their Armour, till at last Guy's better blade wounded the Duke in his right Shoulder, so that he could no more resist, but down his idle weapon dropped ; this prodigious Valour so amazed the spectators, that long they stood gazing, not knowing what to think, while various discourses rumoured round, and the ignorant sort affirmed it was no man that fought, but some Spirit transform'd into an humane shape ; the Combatants stood mute, not knowing what was best to do, till the Duke of Lorain burning with emulation, pizzed forward his proud Steed, and coming towards Guy, said : Sir Knight

The Famous HISTORY of

Knight, to me unknown, whom Fortune has hitherto been pleased to favour, think not to bear these Trophies of Honour hence, for they of right belong to me ; so saying, he couched his Launce, but Guy met it with his sword and at one blow cut it in sunder like a Reed, then charged upon the Duke , who strait began to stagger beneath the weight of his fierce Arms, making but weak resistance, so that at a fifth blow Guy broke his Helm and huised him sore, at which he cryed for quarter, saying, Hold dread Champion, for I yield; nor is there mortal power that can resist thy force ; I will no more with thee contend for woman-kind, whose strength is so much more than man ; I yield and do confess thou art my Conqueror ; this said, his servants bore him thence. After this havock made among the French and German Peers, none durst enter the list nor talk of combating with Guy, which the Emperoz perceiving, sent a Knight for him, with whom Guy went, and humbly saluted the Emperoz and the faire Princess, who late under a Canopy of State on his right hand , to Guy the Emperoz thus began.

Renowned Knight, tell me what place was first made happy with thy birth, for sure that Country must be proud of such a worthy man. To whom Guy made answer , May it please your Imperial Majesty, your faithful servant first in England drew his breath, England is my Native soil , from whence I long have been detained in toykes of War. Surely (said the Emperoz) that place must be impregnable that has such a Bulwark as thou to defend it; great Alcides thou hast sure n̄ done, and Hector's Arms could not with thine compare ; thou ever hast deserved my praise redoubted Knight, nor can the breath of Majesty enough proclaim thy worth ; take there the Virgin thou hast won, accept her, though she is unworthy of so brave a man, and with her ask (except my Diadem) ought in my Empire, and it'lle freely granted. To whom Guy bowing low, returned all humble thanks, and creased the praises that he breathed upon him, at which the Emperor gave Guy a Jewell and departed, leaving him and the beautious Lady to discourse of love alone; when Guy, after due reverence done, addressed himself in this manner : fair Angel, in whom Natures chief perfections shine, on whom (o. without desert) she has bestowed her choicest favours, most worthy to be adored a d admired, command your servant to try his chardience, in whatsoe'er your Prince-ly thoughts think fit : to which with a modest yet Majestick Grace the Princess thus replied.

Renowned Sir, these praises are not mine, 'tis I must serve you now, seeing your sword hath won me, since such is my Fathers pleasure, therefore forbear these Extasies, least your words shoulde make me blush ; and so betry the weakness of our loving sex.

GUY Earl of WARWICK.

At which Guy half o'recome with Love, a while stod mute, and had been surely conquered by her prevailing eyes, had not his vows to Phelice made, come fresh into his mind, whereat he reassumed his manly virtue, and drove assailing passions headlong back, and after recollecting, thus he answers :

Fair Lady, in whom is lively stamp'd the Image of my Love, in thy fair face my Phelice now appears, although my Sword has purchased thee with wounds, yet all I can do, is but to be your servant, for know, my heart e're I beheld your Beauty, in England was linked too fast for any separation, except by the Tyrant Death, that Enemy to Love : I have (said he) a beautious Lady, not unlike to you, to whom my vows are past, never to be recalled, I had not thought that Earth could have afforded such another, but in beholding your perfections, I acknowledg my mistake ; for her I roam the World about, to search where Mars's tents are spread, in bloody Battels, and in Combats great and hazardous, to venture all the stock of life that Nature lent me, so that if I through danger can escape, her promised Love is the fair Lawrel that must crown me toyl.

At which he ended, and the Princess fetching a deep sigh, thus began : I see (said he) that Valour dwells not in thy breast alone, but thereby virtue reigns, which makes thy worth the more ; sure most happy must that Lady be to whom such vows are made, and your constancy appears so just and true ; I shall not dare to break the sacredty of Oaths, that link your distant souls, though I could wish----- at which she stopt, and turning, sighed, while blushes dyed her Rose checks, and all the Lillies were quite put to flight ; then turning again, she said, Most honourable man, here take these Jewels, and present her with from me, who must enjoy a bliss I dare not think upon, least prevailing passion should too great a conquest gain over my frailty. So saying, she (after having received Guys humble thanks) departed, the place not longer being able to suppress her love.

Guy, after leave taken of the Emperoz, to whom he made his love to Phelice known, and the cause of his undertaken travails and hardships, was by the Emperoz command accompanied to the Sea-side by all the Nobility of the Court, where imbarquing, he set sail for England, as now hoping Phelice would open her willing arm to receive the Hero that had brought her love so dear.

Where Landing, he as swift as Eagles fly,
Speed to behold the center of his Joy.

The Famous HISTORY of

C H A P. VII.

How Guy at his Arrival was received by Phalice and all the Nobility : How he is sent forth again to seek new Adventures, but e're he goes, Kills a monstrous Iachanted Cow upon Dunsmore Heath, and is Knighted by the King, and many favours bestowed upon him.

Phalice having received the news of Guy's approach, and by the sound of Fame heard all the Warlike Deeds his hands had done, and the Chivalrous Exploits, (of which by this time England rung) she prepares to receive him

G U T Earl of WARWICK.

him at so pleasing a rate, as might become his Worth and Greatness, yet was man like resolving to stifle as much as possible her powerful passion, thereby to make him the more fond and eager in the chase of Beauty.

Guy now arrived at Warwick Castle, where he heard the price of all his toyl in dreadful Battel there remained, who at the inward gate (attended by her Damzels) stood ready to receive him, whom Guy no sooner saw, but bowing low, he thus salutes.

Fair Phælice, from whom I have too long been absent, how thy bright face refreshes now my Soul, and feasts my gazing Eyes with Beauty transplendent, as when a long benighted Travellour surrounded with dark terrors, in a pathless maze, from the Orient Sky beholds the comfortable dawn of Light, which ushers in the Sun's resplendent beams, for to invest the drowsie World with day ; for Madam, in the midst of War, when Death was raging round me, the thoughts of you inspired me with double force, and gave me victory in all Attempts, so that finding no more to do, I am with joy returned, to claim the promise that you made, leaving the Beauties that this sword in bloody Combates won ; nor could the Emperor's Daughter (though divinely fair, and next your self, Earths Gem) intice my stay ; her sighs had not the power to make me false, though through a Sea of Princely Blood I waded to obtain her, yet when obtained, I left her for your sake, and only took these pledges that you see for the recompence of hazards run ; then say my goddess, wilt thou now grant me a sweet repose in that loved bosome ? shall I rest from bloody Mars's toyles, and court bright Venus in thy fairer Armes ? speak, for I would gladly know.

To whom Phælice blushing, replied :

Most honourable man, of thy great Exploits I am no ways ignorant, Fame came before and told them, e're you came I heard what havock you have made, and what great prizes you have won ; but yet methinks those Beautys should have been esteemed more by you than to be left for such trifles ; but I know your Answer will be, you did it for my sake ; 'tis sure it was so, I believe as much, and will reward your constancy with love, a love as boundless as the Ocean, and chaste as those bright fires that shine by night : but to be plain, I will unfold a secret Vision that to me appeared , when I was cruel and returned disdain for love : In the midst of slumber , Cupid from his Crystal Mansion did ascend, presenting to my view a Martial Hero, much resembling your self, commanding me to love you for your great Renown and matchless Might, saying, the terror of the Nations shall he be famed to all posterity, Kings shall be proud to court him, and great Monarchs tremble at his frown ; so saying, he let fly from his bended Bow a glittering shaft, that fired in my breast, at which awaking, I found the kindled flame burn bright ; but though I love thee dear, yet for my Honours sake, must not consent to wed, till thy victorious brow be wreathed with more Lawrels, and when thou shalt return once more triumphant, then is Phælice thine, and toylsome War shall cease.

The Famous HISTORY of

Then said Guy, I must not yet discharge my servant Death, he must again with me, while from the terror of this Arm each mortal flies, and Armies fall before me like Autumnal Leaves, when the tossing Branches are assailed by gusty winds ; come my bright goddes, as I stand within these Walls of Steel, incircle me in thy fair Armes, and cheer my foal with one soft kiss, and e're I do return, i'le send my Trophies home by Fame ; thy longing Ears shall hear of such great Actions done, as shall make thee conclude thy servant worthy of thy Love. Be constant, fairest of creatures, and think upon thy faithful Guy, who in the midst of Arms and Death will never fail to think on thee, that so at my return Hymenial Joys and the possession of thy lovely bed shall crown my distant toyl in War ; now look to it ye Champions of the World, Princes and Potentates, for Guy once more must wander o're the Globe to seek Adventures out.

So saying, he killed her, and departed to take his leave of t'ye most Noble Earl, whilst she with eyes brimfull of Tears withdrew to her retirement, often accusing her self for pushing him so wards on such hazardous designs, and yet ambitious of his gaining Honour, and so between willing and unwilling, she left him to his fortunate AdVENTURES.

Whilst Guy unto Earl Robands goes, who received him with more Joy than can be well expressed, and orders a Feast to be made in honour of his new-come Guest, inviting most of the Gentry thereabouts, who hearing of Guy's Arrival in England, and that he was to be present there, they came gladly, as being much desirous to see him after so many great Exploits ; the Entertainment was sumptuous, being accommodated with all manner of Musick, and what else had power so to delight the senses.

Which ended, Guy following the Earl into his retirement, told him that he came to take his leave of his Honour, and that he had made a vow to Heaven, the which he durst not violate, once more to try his fortune in Countrys abroad, because this my Native Land affords no great Exploits worthy to be Registered by Fame. Thus he said, but would not make the Earl acquainted with his Love, nor that his Daughter had injoyned the Enterprizes he designed to make, who indeavourred all he could to perswade him to the contrary laying before him the many hazards that must needs attend, and what dire mishaps in such daring attempts must needs befall ; at which Guy no wayes daunted daunted, was the more earnest to depart, saying, he could not confine himself to ease, but for the honour of his country would spend some days in War, & try the various moods of Fortune and Fate, to learn for to contemn them both, and that his mind still prompted him to great designs, the god of Battel at his Nativity being Lord of the Ascendant.

GUY Earl of WARWICK.

The Earl seeing his persuasions could no ways work on him to stay, dismissed him, uppon promise at his returne he would abroade no more, but live at home with him; Guy's Father and Mother bathed in tears, likewise besought his stay, but all in vain, for nothing but dread Arms and sounds of War were pleasing to his Ears. All things being in readiness for his departure, he imbarqued for France again, to seek out new Adventures, nothing fearing though he knew that he had many there who would (it possible) by strength or fraud surprize his life; but before the Master of the Vessel could get clear of the Land's end, the Wind turn'd about, and rising somewhat strong, forced them back into the harbour, where they lay unknown to the people of that place who they were; then was Guy's Vessel Wind-bound six days, in which space Famine had noised through every corner of the land, how that a dreadful and monstrous Beast, formed by Magick Skill into the likeness of a Cow, or rather a Cow of vast bulk possest by some tempestuous Spirit, did terrifie the neigbouring Plains, destroying the Cattel round about, and putting all their keepers unto flight, being so strong and swift in motion, that it was thought no humane force could have destroyed it; the monst'ous description of her as followeth, is affirmed by Authors of great integrity and worth; that she was four yards in height, six in length, and had an head proportionable, armed with two sharp Horns growing direct, with Eyes all red and fiery, which seemed to dart Lightning from afar, she being of a Dun colour, from whence she was named the Dun Cow, and the place, not many miles distant from Warwick, where she haunted, from that Monster took the name of Dunsinore Heath, which name it kæps unto this day.

Upon the notice the King had at York, (where he then was) of the havock and slaughter this Beast had made, he offered Knighthood and several other Gifts of great worth to any that would venture his life in that encounter, but the terror of her fiercenes had spread it self in such a dreadful shape, that none durst undertake the Enterprize, but each one wishing for Guy, whom all supposed by this time in France.

Glad of this opportunity, he leaves the Ship, and having changed his Armour to avoid being known, he takes a strong Battel-Ax, his Bow and Quiver with him, and so Incognito riding to the place where this Monster used to lodge, which was among a great Thicket of Trees that grew upon

the

The Famous HISTOR Y of

The Plain, near to a Pool or standing water, finding as he had passed along all the Shepherds Cottages deserted, and the Carcasses of Men and Beasts lyé scattered round about ; he no sooner came within Bow-shot of the place, but the Monster espyed him, and putting out her head through the Thicket, with dreadful eyes glared on him, and began to roar horribly, at which Guy who was one of the expertest Archers England then had, bent his Bow of Steel, and drawing an Arrow to the head, let fly, the whiche as swift as Lightning striking on the Monsters hide, rebounded as from a Wall of Adamant , not making the least impression, at which, whilſt Guy was wondring, but she came with ſped as ſemed rather throughe the Air than on the Earth, and at him aimed directly her Sharp-pointed Horns, which he obſerving, lifteſt his Ax on high, and ſmote her on the front with ſuch a blow, as made her to recoil ; at which ſhe more enraged came on again, and clapping her Horns upon his breast dinted his high-proofed Armour e're he could avoid her, but whaeling his warlike Hoſte unto the right, he met her again, and with a redoubled ſtroke gave her a wound under the ear, which was the only place ſhe was ſensible of being wounded in, whereat ſhe roared aloud, and ſtamped the ground ; Guy percei- ving ſhe was mortal, followed that ſtroke with another no leſs forcible, at which ſhe fell to the ground, and Guy alighting, hewed upon her ſo long, that through her impenetrable ſkin he battered her ſkull, till with an horrid groan ſhe there expired, where leaving her ſweltered in a ſtream of blood, he rode to the next inhabited Village, where he made known the Monsters death, to the unspeakable Joy of all that heard it, the poor people honouring him with pre- ſents and thanks more than can here be told, thousands from all parts flock- ing to behold that Monster dead, whom alive they ſo much feared. Long it was not e're the King had notice of it, who ſent for Guy to York , where he no ſooner arrived, but the King embraced him in his armes, and after a ſplendid entertainment, he gave him the order of Knighthood, with many other rich gifts, cauſing one of the Ribs of the ſaid Monster to be hanged up in Warwick Castle, of which more hereafter, for now we muſt leave England and follow Guy into France.

Where he ſuch deeds in Arms did ſoon atchieve,
That they may ſtagger 'lmoſt for to believe.

GUY Earl of WARWICK.

C H A P. VIII.

How Guy, Herald, and two other Knights were set upon by sixteen Villains that lay in wait for him in a Wood, whom he destroyed, they first having killed two of his Knights: Afterwards assailing the Duke of Lorain, who was besieged by the Duke of Lorraine; he routed Lorraine's Armies with great slaughter, and afterwards confirms a peace between them.

Guy having with much ado got leave of the King to depart the Court, secretly took Ship again, without the knowldg of Earl Robands or his teau-

The Famous HISTOR Y of

beautious Mistress (who now doubtless would have been contented to have opened her willing arms); so that with thre Knights more, (viz. Sir Herauld, Sir Edfrid, and Sir Martis, who had entred into strictest friendship with him, bowing to live and dye in adventuring for his sake;) he landed after two days sail in France, where in search of Warlike busyness they crossed the Country, but finding no Enterpizes worthy of their swords, they went towards the Emperors Court, where Guy doubted not but to employ his Arm, and gain the Fame he thirsted for; but the great Duke of Tuskany Otton by name, hearing of Guy's approach, supposed he came to deprive him of faire Blanch the Emperors Daughter, into whose favour (since Guy's departure) he had insinuated himself, many ways excusing the soills he received by the English Knight; and thereupon picking sixteen of the best & stoutest Souldiers he had in his Castle, he gave them order to arm themselves, and lye in Ambush in the Wood, near to the Road where Guy must pass before he could come to the Court; and as soon as they see him, to fall upon him, and after they had killed him, to bury him in the Wood, that so the fact might not be known.

To this command of these Lord they readily consent, not knowing what manner of man they had to deal with; so that placing themselves behind a Thicket of Trees, they had not long waited before they saw Guy and the other three come riding towards them, regardless of any such treachery; no sooner was they within reach, but the Russians burst from their Ambuscade, and charged upon the English Heroes, crying, Kill, Kill; at which Guy and his three trusty Knights began to wonder what it meant, but long they wondered not, e're they drew their glittering swords; Courage (said Guy) my friends, these Villains shall pay dear for this affront; with that he frowned with such a look, as when the Skyes over-cast with black Clouds portend dread storms and tempest through the Air, and then let fly with such force and rage, as all that his sword touched fell slain or wounded to the Earth, Armour all in pieces, cut Helms and Helmed Heads lay scattered on the plate, so dreadfully he layed about, that in short space ten of them lay breathless; but casting round his eyes, he saw the remaining six had so fiercely combated his three Companions, that two of them were slain, and Sir Herauld all besmeared with blood, which flowed from gaping wounds, at which Guy thus exprest his Ire: Villains, whose lives fate has designed a Sacrifice to my Revenge, let the Knight rest and Combat me; What! do my eyes behold two of my dear friends (who left their Native Land for to accompany me) silentced by Death, and the third more dear than they, mortally wounded! This Villains is the last vile act your hands shall ever do; with that he charged upon them

GUY Earl of WARWICK.

them with such force, as far exceeded Hercu'es when he the Centaures slew, & in short space cut five of them in picces, the sixth upon his knees begged Life, and did confess who had imployed them, and to what intent, whereupon Guy withheld his dreadful arm, but it was too late, for the miserable man only liv'd to tell the treachery, and dyed through his excessive woundes. At which Guy not unmindful of his murtherred and wounded Knights, sent an herald to not far distant thence, and gave him order for to bury the two slain, and to take in Herauld into his charge and care, laring a grieuous curse upon him if he medled with the Rest, and so departed (after leave taken) through the solitary Grove, bewailing much the losg of his dear friends, yet not declining Honours search, no sooner had he passed the thick shades, but from a rising Hill he beheld a fair and goodly City, before whiche on a Plain were many armed Knights assembled, to joust at Tilt and Turnament, the which somewhat revived his spirits, as well hoping to find Duke Orten there, and so revenge on him the treachery, but he was not at that time so fortunate; for the Duke, by his Scouts having notice of the death of his men, and that Guy was approaching, he feign'd a sudden sicknes, and so withdrew from Court. Guy being arrived, thrust in among the thickest Banks to seek the man he so much longed to combat with, but not finding him, he challenged all there present, and after having solld the best that durst encounter him, & won the Prize, he departed with great applause to the Duke of Millain's Court, where no sooner he arrived, but the Duke embrac'd him in his armes, and prepared a sumptuous entertainment for him.

Long he had not reked there, before he understood that the Duke of Lovain to whom Guy had sworen friendship, was besieged by Lorains power; whereupon Guy taking leave, hasted to help his friend. As he was riding over a Moory Plain, he met a Pilgrim, as he supposed, all clad in gray, who seemed faint with travell, whom he kindly saluted, and intreats for to acquaint him with some News. News! said the Pilgrim, and with that he fetch'd a sigh. Alas sir, it is a thing I now am no ways conversant with, but have renounct the World and all its busyness, since I have lost my dearest friend, and on his search have travelled, and must travell with many weary steps, for till I find him, my soul can take no rest. I pity thee, said Guy, but may be so kind as to declare the man, perhaps I may inform you, for 'tis sure that I shoule know that voice. Alas! said he, there is a man renowned in Arms through all the spacious World, one for whose sake I left my Native Land, and one who saved my life from cruel Foemen. With that Guy understood that it was Herauld, nor could he conceal himself, but pulling up his Visage, discovered his face, and immediately allightning embrac'd him while he wept for joy, expresting these words : And has kind Heaven been so propitious as to restore thy Life, whom I supposed dead ? behold me Herald, I am he you sought, hencefor th let care be banished from this Breast ; my ealy Request is now to know how your wounds were cured. To whom this Herald replied with his eyes o're-flowed with tears of Joy : Oh, how can it be ! am I thus unlooked-for made so happy ! then know, worthy Guy, the Hermit with whom you left me in charge, after having conducted me faint as I was to his Cave, poured Balsams into my wounds, and with sovereign Cordials refreshed my fading Spirits.

The Famous HISTOR Y of

So that after some continuance in his Cave, I gathered Strength, but could not be contented in my mind, for loss of you, whicg restlessness the god old Hermit perceiving, was very inquisitive to know the ca'e, which I as freely declared, upon which he delivered me this Cloyn to cover my Armour, that so I might the more securely travel in thy search, the which has now happily been successful. So spake Herald, and Guy with Joy again embraced him, and thanked him for his Love and Friendship, causing him to mount behid him; and so they rode, discoursing of their vacious Adventures, till they came to the beleaguered City, and breaking through the Hostil Ranks of foes, came to the City Gate, where they soon found entrance ; the Duke no sooner hearing that Guy was come unto his aid, but he came and humbly saluted him, bidding him ten thousand welcomes, and each drooping Souldier was reviv'd at his Name, crying, Lead on, Lead on, and let us faint out and charge the Foe : The Duke laying hold on this opportunity, thought it not convenient to let their COURAGES cool, gave order to his Commanders to prepare for the Battel, and that on pain of death they should be obedient unto whatsoever Guy should think fit ; this being done, the Gates were opened and the Souldiers with such a shout that echoed through the Skies, issud out, and charged the Foe with such brabery and courage, that they with much slaughter forced them to retreat, broken and in great confusion ; Guy and Herald pursuing them even to their Camp, cutting their way through armed Squadrons, and putting them to the rout far and near, whilst all the blushing Plains lay strewed with dead and dying men, so that Guy, in compassion to Christian lives, bid spare the sword, and stayed the Souldiers fury making slaughter cease.

This overthow vexed the Duke of Lorraine so sore, that he immediately vowed revenge, giving order that the Militia of his Dukedom should immediately march to recrute his bro. Army, so that within ten days he laid Siege again, with thiryp Thousand Horse and Foot, owing not to leave the City till they had layed it as low as Earth ; and he upon begire it with his his Souldiers round, resolving so by cutting off Communication, to force it to a surrender, for want of provision, but the st atagem prevailed not; For Guy and the Duke feid the walls obseving their intention, the better to disencourage them in that point, like Manlius the Roman General, when besieged by the Gallifenes, in the Capital, gave Order to throw provision in abundance down, telling the Enemy, that if they wanted more, upon Request they might be furnished, for said Guy, I would not starve my Soe leal when overthrown in Battel, he shoud excuse his weaknes for want of Food; but now you have provision, feast your selves, that I may find you more resolute in War than heretofore I have done, for e're the Sun descends into the Western Ocean, deadfull slaughter again shall rage through all the bloody field. This said, he gave Order to his Souldiers for to Arm, while Drums and Trumpets roused their drousie courages; then leading forth ten thousand of the most expertest in thre bands, the first commanded by himself, the second by the Duke, and the third by Herald; the two first, each consisting of thre thousand foot and one thousand horse, and the last of two thousand foot only.

GUY Earl of WARWICK.

With these en battell'd Forces Guy marching in the Van, charged the Germans in the Front, and with his sword cut a passage for his Squadrons throught their pointed Ranks, that Hysveres Spears flew round his Head like Hail; while this was doing, the Duke and Herald charged on the Right and the Left of the Enemy with such courage and bravery, that the Germans finding themselves assaulted on all sides, endeavoured to fly, and had left their Duke to shif for his safety amidst his foes, had not pure shame restrained: Guy observing how they fell into disorder, and began to shrink together, pressed them the more, and having made a wide gap with infinite slaughter of his foes, at last came where the Duke of Lorain fought, who no sooner beheld (all besmeared with blood, and) what havock he had made, but by retreating amongst his own Squadrons of horse, he thought fit to aviod his fury; and finding shortly after that the Battel went against him, he caused a Retreat to be sounded, so that in much confusion he withdrew, leaving about ten thousand of his men dead upon the place; whilst Guy and the Lovainians charged upon the flying remains, till they filled the ditches and fields with the slain and wounded, even till Guy out of compassion stayed the Souldiers from pursuing, and with the spoyl of the Enemies Camp marched back in triumph to the Town, where Guy was received under a Canopy, and a Trophy raised, in memory of his matchless Valour, and their chief deliveter.

After the Ceremonies were overpast, Guy taking the Duke into private retirement, demanded of him, that if after this Victory he wold make a League of amity with Lorain, to which he joyfully replied, he was content;

The Famous HISTOR Y of Celby then, said Guy, I shall be more proud to establish a firm friendship between two such Potentates, than in innumerable Victories, for I hold it not convenient for Christians to War with Christians, and waste each other to glut the jaws of slaughter ; but that we rather unite our Forces to bend our Arms against the raging Infidels, who now tyannize over the Eastern World, late by usurpation taken from the Roman Empire : Sir, replied the Duke, if you will favour me so far as to conclude this friendly League, what ever you shall propose, I willingly will sign unto. Guy thanked the Duke, and with a Thousand Armed men marched towards the hill where the Lorrainians broken Forces lay incamped, or rather scattered, and no sooner coming to the foot of the said hill, but he sounded a Parley ; at which the Duke sent down his Lieutenant General to know the cause ; to whom Guy made known his undertaking, and withal desired a personal Treaty with the Duke, giving him to understand who he was ; this being no sooner known, but the Duke mounted, and attended by some of his choice Commanders, came riding down towards the Plain, the which Guy no sooner perceiving, but giving order to his men to stand in Battel array, he set Saws to his Horse, and hasted to meet him, and in the midway they allighting, embrac'd each other, after which Guy thus began.

Great Prince, against whom in our defence we fought, and Heaven favouring the righteous cause, commanded Victory to attend us, which has adorned our conquering Arms with spoiles; yet forgetting and laying aside all farther enmity or quarrels, I from Lobain's Great Duke here bring you terms of peace ; for why should Christians War, and Christians Arms shed Christians blood ? then let it be no longer so Great Sir, embrace our offered friendship, and no more let us be foes ; we impose no difficulties as Conquerors use, but desire for to embrace with equal Armes : What though your Nephew was by accident slain, as the Duke himself confesses much against his will, which was the cause begat this War, your Highness must forget it ; nay, moreover when you consider that thirty thousand lives have made sufficient Attonement to his silent Ghost : Let us henceforth War against the Pagan powers, to drive them back to their distant Asia, and rid Europe of such a curb. So said Heroick Guy, to whom the Duke replied.

Most honoured man, whose force in Arms no mortal can resist, though I am much grieved for my Nephews death, by Segwings hand bereaved of Life, and more for these shameful overthrows, yet at thy request it shall be Peace, and henceforth horrid War in Jants Temple shall be locked up fast, while bound in chains on impious Arms she sits complaining, with an hundred bloody mouths : Go worthy English man, go tell my Brother, for now enmity enmity is banished, that's the Name that a Royal Tent shall on this Plain be pitched, in which an everlasting peace shall be concluded for thy sake.

GUY Earl of WARWICK.

Upon which Guy thanked the Duke, and returning to the City, did arēd to Segwin what had passed, who embrāted Guy and payed his labour with rich presents and a thousand thanks, and then issuing out in pompos attire attended by all his Nobles, Guy being placed in his Chariot on the right and Herald on his Left, they drove to the Tent or Pavilion of state, where Sigbert Duke of Lorain in splendid Equipage attend their coming, where alighting, they embrāted each other with such fervency, as if enmity had been a stranger to them, and sumptuously feasted each other for the space of six days, so that the noise of War was turned into Joy and delight, caused by all manner of noble Pastime, and at last friendship so prevailed, that at the earnest request of Guy, Duke Sigbert of Lorain gave Segwin Duke of Lovania his eldest daughter fair Mirinda in Marriage, which doubly crowned the Joy on all sides; the which being somewhat abated, Guy impatient of ease, requested Forces of the two Dukes, to go against the Sarazens, who had then broke in upon the Greek Empire, and laid great part of it waste, to which motion they were very unwilling to condescend, desiring him out of all love to stay with them, and not to hazard himself in such dangerous Enterprizes; but they finding him resolute in his resolution, and that they in vain persuaded him to the contrary, intreated him to draw out what Forces he thought sufficient, and that they would furnish him with all things convenient for the War, at which Grant, Guy returned them thanks, assuring that he would so employ them to the honour of Christendome, that after ages should wonder at their powres; and thereupon he selected two thousand of the choicest Souldiers present, one of Loranians, and the other of Lovanians, who were willinger to go under his command than can be imagined; so he having embarked them upon ten Ships of War, took his leave of the two Dukes, with promise to visit them at his return, and bring them such Trophys as the fortunes of War should deal him, whereupon they accompanied him to the Hore, and departed not thence till his Ships were quite sailed out of sight,

So much he honoured was where e're he came,
And lookt upon as the eldest Son of Fame.

The Famous HISTORY of

C H A P. IX.

How Guy being furnished with two Thousand Men and ten Ships of War, Marched to the Relief of Bizantium, then besieged by the Turks and Sarazens, and being scattered from the rest of his Fleet, is set upon by three Pyrates, two of which he destroys, and forceth the third to fly ; Relieves the City, kills many of the Pagan Champions ; and in his return fights with a fiery Dragon and kills him.

After a months sailing, Guy having coasted Italy, and entred far into the Mediterranean Sea, where by a levant Wind being separated above two Leagues from the rest of his Fleet, he was set upon by thre Turks men of War, belonging to Salle, who supposing him a Prize, and that his Ship was filled with rich Merchandise, came boldly up and endeavoured to board him, which Guy perceiving, smiled disdainfully, and with many Heroick expressions encouraging his men, he drew his flaming Sword, so dreadfully known in War, and charged upon the assailing Infidels with such fury, that all he reached, glutted the gaping jaws of death, cutting their shouds, tackle and all other their Engins in pieces like a twine thrad, whilst Herald and the rest were not idle on the other side, for having prepared Pitch, Hemp, Tar and Rosin, they set it on fire, and with a certain Engine threw it into the Turks Ship that engaged them, on that side, (a stratagem till then unknown) which catching hold on the Decks, Masts, and Rigging, blazed into an horrid flame, which seemed to curl amongst the Clouds, the which they being no way able to extinguish, with a dreadful cry forsook the burning ruines, and leaped into the Ocean, where many of them perished ; which the other two ships seeing, hoisted up all their Sails, and endeavoured to fly, which one of them effected ; but Guy having close grappled with the other, was leaped on board her, and there made such slaughter, that all the Decks were covered covered with the slain, which so amazed the Turks, that they cryed aloud to Mahomet to come and save them from the Devils that fought against them, but their prayers were in vain, till Guy out of compassion spared their lives, and putting forty of his men on board, sent them with the remaining Prisoners to his friend the Duke, as the first fruits of his Achievements; no sooner was this engagement ended, but all his shippes came up with him, who by reason of a fogg mistook their way, so that night coming on, Guy commandes them to stand off to the South-East, and sail gently till morning,

GUY Earl of WARWICK.

The Famous HISTORY of

ing, for fear of running foul upon the Rocks that are too frequent in those parts, hid under Water, near to the shores, &c.

No sooner the insuing morning had the Sun sent forth his Orient beams, but from his deck Guy viewed the Coast, and from afar beheld a City besieged, and heard the murmur of their shouts to bolly through the Air, much like the sound of Thunder almost spent; whereupon he ordered his Pilot to fathom for the next convenient landing place; which being found, he put in, and sent Sir Herauld with two more Captains, to understand if possible who the besieged and the besiegers were; which message they as willingly undertook, and after about five houres stay, return'd with this following Account, which they learnt from a stragling Turk, whom they also brought with them as their Prisoner, that it was Bizantum, made famous by the honours done to it by Constantine the Great, and late the Metropolitan City of the Greek Empire, and that the Souldian of Babylon with thirty thousand men layed Siege against it, his Forces for the most part consisting of Turks and Sarazens, and that the Siege had continued with much slaughter on both sides for the space of thre moneths, the City being defended by a number of Christians, under the Command of Albertus a noble Saxon.

This

GUY Earl of WARWICK.

This was not a little pleasing to Guy who had now met with a fair opportunity of making his valour known, so that immediately he sent Herald and one Knight more to the Lord Albertus to acquaint him that he lay in the Port with two thousand Christians under his command, and that if he would in the Evening open the Gates that looked to the Seaward, he would fight his way through the Foes and enter the City; Herald and the other Knight undertake the Embalys, and in Turks habit having got the watchward of the Prisoners, they passed the Guards, and being come to the gate knocked aloud, and no sooner declaring that their Message was to Albertus but the Porter opening the Wicket gave them Entrance, when strait they were conducted to the Castle where the General and his chief commanders were assembled in a Council of War, to whom after reverence done, they made known the cause of their coming; at the first mention of which Albertus and the rest were somewhat doubtful least it might be some treacherous design to win the Town, but when their Letter of credence under Guy's hand and Seal were produced, they stood no longer pausing but treated them with all imaginable kindness: saying, that they would not only open the gate at the hour appointed, but likewise at the same time sally out upon the Foe to make his entrance more easie and so dismissed them with many expressions of joy: the time being come Guy landed his men as silently as possible, and drawing them up in Battalia upon the shore, gave order to those that remained in the Ships to stand off to Sea, till he signified to them his farther pleasure by an appointed sign, which accordingly being done, he marched towards the City, bue e're he could gain entrance, the Enemy took the Alarum, so that Arm, arm, they cryed throughout, they came and drew up from every quarter, which Guy perceiving held it no time to dally, but heartning his Souldiers, with telling them the uprightness of their sacred cause, he bid them sound a charge, ordering his men to keepe together in a Body, he draws his Sword which by Moonlight reflected like a Comet in the Air, the rest soon imitated him, and giving a great shout the which was answered from the Town, they fell upon the Foes with such undaunted fury that they bore down all before them, whilst Leggs, Heads, broen Armes, and mangled Shirts of Mail besrewed the Crimson plain, Guy enforcing himself with redoubled strength the better to give his followers encouragement, had made such slaughter where he fought, that the slain like ramparts hemmed him in, the dispute continued exceeding sharp for the space of two hours, so that what were slain by Guy and the fiftay hundred men he brought on shoor with him (the rest being left to man the Ships) and by thre thousand who at the same instant sallyed from the Town and charged them in the Rear, there perished of the Mahomitans no less then forty thousand, so that finding themselves worsted on all sides, they in much disorder and confusion retreated to their Camp, the which when the Souldian heard, he vowed revenge, and gave orders for assaulting the City as soon as day appeared, it being then night Guy suffered their retreat as not thinking it convenient to pursue them, he with his Souldiers entered the Town, and were most joyfully received, and the hurt men look too with all diligence, Albertus embracing Guy, conducted him to his own lodging, and there feasted him as well as the place could afford, and ordered the same should be done to all his Souldiers passing away most part of the night in various discourses concerning the affairs of the War, and what had hap- pened since the first beginnning of the siege.

The Famous HIST O R Y of

Next morning as soon as day-light appeared, the Souldian commanded the Captain of his Army to prepare for the assault, ordering the Drumes to beat and the Trumpets to sound, at which the Pagans gave such a shout as made the Hills resound the Echo back, which Roused Guy from his slumber, who starting up, instantly ascended the Tower, and from thence beheld an innumerable host of Infidells marching towards the Walls with scaling Engins: whereupon he gave order to herald to get his men in readyness, who carefully obeyed his command, then turning to Albertus, he said, Sir, It behoves us this day for the honour of Christendom to make a brave defense, in my opinion 'tis most fit to meet thole daring incrochers on your plain, and there to give them battell ere they can reach our Walls, so that may be a means to check their pride, Victory has lead us you to already, which will much animate our Souldiers on, and disencourage o're foes, and let me tell you she never turn'd against me yet, nor failed to pratch upon my Arms and labour me in all my bold attempts follow Guy and fear not but Guy's fortunes will attend you. so said the Warlike Hero of whose high courage Albertus much approved, rendering thanks to Heaven for sending such a Champion to defend the Town, long they paused not, because the Enemy was at hand, but suringing open the Gate, sallyed out with twelve thousand men at Armes to meet them according as Guy had proposed, he with his Germans marching in the Front, his great Standard being a Lyon Rampant; no sooner the Enemy beheld them to march towards them who not in the least expected any such thing, but they made a halt, and throwing down their scaling Engins put themselves in Battalia, the which Guy perceiving gave order to his Archers that were in the Front to begin the Battell, who drawing their bows sent a shower of Arrows amongst them, which galled the Turkish horse and forced them into disorder, whereupon Guy

and

GUY Earl of WARWICK.

and Herauld broke into the main body, and killing or wounding all that opposed them began a dreadful fight, so that the Germanes following stole after them, still pressed them to the right and the left with shot of Arrows, the which struck no small terror to the infidels the Bizantines under the command of Albertus imitating them in a short time put the Enemies left wing to the Rout whilst Guy fought in the main body, hewing his bloody way whiles death marked his Eyes, and where so ever they aimed he flew, nothing but rout and ruin inclosed him round whilst Heaps of slain lay like a Mound on either hand, fighting on untill he came unto the Squadron that was led by Cobron Lieutenant Generall of the Horse, he being newly come to the Battel began to wonder what he saw what havock Guy had made, and how his Armes were all besmeared with blood, and staring with broad and fiery eyes, he vowed revenge swearing to sacrifice Guy's life unto his Pagan Gods, this Monster of a man being ten foot high and seven in circuit bearing a mighty spear, and such a sword as no man in the Pagan Army (himself excepted) could undertake to wield, so that pressing forwards confronted Guy, crying aloud, Elite Christian mortall enemies to my right hold thy murthering hand and let us two each other's weapon try, for e're we part I mean to sacrifice thee to the Ghosts of my dear Friends whom thou hast slain, at which Guy fixing his Eyes upon him slyled, saying , thou art the only man I long have sought , therefore let us lose no time

With that they charged upon each other with such fury, that from rattling Armour the blows like thunder echo'd, whilst either side sent thous up to the Skies, Guy having born the brunt of the battel all that day, the Pagans doubt not but that their Champion would prevail, by reason of his monstrous size and strength , having been often tryed in dreadful Combates , but they were mistaken , for Guy redoubling his strength cut through his high prodded Armour, making such wide wounds, that made him roar like the enraged Sea, when bounding from a hollow Rock , and endeavours to retire, but Guy pursuing him with one full stroak, cut through his Helm so deep into his head, that down he fell in deaths Convulsions on the crimson Earth.

At this the Pagans all amazed shrank together , till Flinadant a fierce Sarazen charging soonest encountered Herauld, who fought on the left , but long they had not engaged e'r he followed his Giantick Brother to the shades beneath.

Morgadnor another Colonei , monstrous for size, desperately engaged with Guy , having in his hand a halberd Ax , which weighed, about one hundred weight , with which he slew severall of Guy's men before he could come on that side where Guy fought, but Guy no sooner encountered him, but with his sword

The Famous HISTOR Y of

cut off his right arm , when falling down , and the loss of blood he was troden to death among the crowd , being unable to relieve himself : Thus the Battel going against them , let Pagans on all sides fled , nor could the Souldian or his General possibly stay then being pursued by Guy and the Byzantines , the slain fell down by the way , to the number of twenty thousand , such havock made they of those Insidels , at which the Souldian storming & cursing his gods , gave order to recollect his broken Troops , to hazard once more the chance of War , and begin the battel , but all in vain , for the Soldiers dreading Guy far worse than death were fled into the woods and Marshy grounds without regard to their Commanders , at which the Souldian was so much enraged , that whilst Guy was taking the spoil , he sent a Challenge to him , demanding single combate with him to end the busyness of the War ; which message Guy most joyfully received ; and all things being in rediness , they met with such fury as made the Earth quake , the Souldian being enraged by despair , and Guy courageous for the honour of Christendome , laid on him such irresistible blows , as made his gilded Armor fly like glasg , and yield a passage to mortals wound that followed thick , so that with one blow on the left side that entred his heart he fell down , breathing out his soul in curses loud : this , Eskeldath a bloody and tyrannick Turkish Prince beholding , vowed revenge , and coming up to Guy deslid him with disdain , cursing him by all his gods , swearing he had vowed his head unto his Mistress , and would bear it unto her on his Launce ; hast thou so quoth Guy , and drawing out his bloody sword , said , pray take it if thy courage will but let thee dare , least the Lady think you did promise moze then you are able to perform , and then perhaps you lose her favour : this no sooner speake , but they charged upon each other , that fire sprang out of their Helms like Lightning flashes , till the Pagan being wounded deep into the arm , let fall his sword , and thinking it no time for taking of it up , he set spurs to his horse and fled to the woods amain .

After this Rout and the plunder of the field taken , Guy returns victorious to the City where he was received with all the pomp that can be possibly conceyed , whilst as he rode through the streets , the people from the houses tops , and windows , threw down Garlands before him , and strewed him with flowers , cryng , Long live the Renowned English Champion , our happy deliverer , and afterwards set up his Statue in the Market place , adoyned with the Enemies spoyl , the whiche was since destroyed by the Turks ; Guy having staid therewith Albertus about ten days , was desirous to depart and to return to England , so that leaving one thousand of his men with Albertus for the guard of the City , he embaygued with the rest , and sailed back for Germany , but one day putting in to Harbour to refresh, Guy and Herald went on Hoare, and being much taken with the pleasantness of the Forrest that bordered on the Sea, they entered the same to see if they could find any Lion, the which standing still to wonder what it meant, they heard it grow louder, quoth Guy lets on and see what Monsters this wild place affords; so passing along, at last they espied a Dragon and a Lyon encountering each other furiously, the which spake pleased Guy so well that he late him down to behold the fray, saying to Herald whosoever gets the Victory shall try the force of my keen blade, the which no sooner said but the Dragon had so overcome the Princely Lyon with his embrowned breath, that grown faint he turned aside; at which Guy rising charged upon the Dragon's scaly hide with force exceeding fell yet as from an Adamantine Rock, his blade rebounded, till at last espying a bare place under the Monsters wing, he thrust his sword some too fast deep, so that with a dreadfull yell the Dragon seemed to cast forth a flash of fire, and with his gushing blood his life expired: the Lyon seeing his Enemy destroyed, proved not ungrateful to the destroyer, but licking of Guy's feet, and expressing all other tokenes of kindness, he followed him to the Ship and then and then making as it were low obedience for the favour Guy had done him in killing his mortal Foe he returned back to the Forrest.

GUY Earl of WARWICK.

So to his Arms both men and beasts did yeild, Whilke Conquest crowns his brows in Mars's Field

C H A P.

The Famous HISTORY of

C H A P X.

How Guy and Herauld travelling through a Forrest, found Eair Terry wounded and his Lady taken from him by sixteen Villians employed by Duke Otton most of whom he kills and restores the Lady to her Husband, &c.

A fter a Months Sailing by several Islands, Castles, Cities and Towns, and the many various adventures that hapned in that space, Guy arrived in Normandy, where Landing, he and Herauld take their progress to the Emperors Court, which was then kept at Bairax, where they no sooner arrived,

GUY Earl of WARWICK.

arrived, but the Emperour hating notice of it, came to meet them, most honorably attended, where in the entrance of the Pallace he embrased Guy, with the endearing affections and favours that Majestie could bestow, honouring him with the Title of Son; so much was our heroicke Champion esteemed by the greatest Potentates of Christendome, for his sake the Emperour caused sumptuous feasts to be prepared, and Banquets furnished with all manner of rareties, and whatsoever could delight the tast, whilst the gazing crowd looked round the Pallace to behold him of whom they had heard so much fame, each chanting forth his Victories: and striving to out-doe each other in singing of his praises, as the only worthy of the world: The Emperour caused Tilt and Turnament to be exercised before him, but would not suffer Guy to enter the List, because he knew none would engage with him; after he had stayed there eight daies he desired the Emperours leave to depart that he might keep his promise with the Dukes of Lovain and Lorain, and with much difficulty obtain'd it, so loath was the Emperour and all the Princes and Nobility of his Court to lose his company, but considering that the dearest friends must part, they dismissed him with great applause, who ordered the Captains of the Ships that then lay at Anchor in the Port to sail homewards, whilst he and Herald crossed the Country the nearest way to the Duke of Lovains Court, the which they readily obeyed, whilst Guy and Herald mounting rode on, but had not passed about ten miles, when entering a huge Forrest, they on a sudden heard dreadful shrieks and a confused noise of Kill, Kill, toward which Guy and Herald directed by the sound came instantly, where in a path they found a man wounded, lying weltring in his blood, whom they alighting knew to be Earl Terry, whereupon they raising him up, demanded how he came in such a plight, to whom he (with a faint voice) replyed, that he having married with a beautiful Lady, Osiled by name, whom before he was married unto, Duke Orion had requested in marriage, but she by reason of his vicious life, had refused his proffer, in revenging which he had hired sixteen villains, who having notice that he and his Lady was to walk that way, lay in ambush and had set upon and wounded him after that barbarous manner; and yet only so but had taken from him his wife, whom more than life he did esteem.

And can the Duke said Guy deal in nothing but treachery, I lately made his villains repent in death so base a Treason, and if I can find out those that have thus wronged me, they shall have, equal sharre dealt them, chear up my friend and know that I am Guy, and by the Conquests that this Sward has won, and all the bloody Battells this hand has fought, I'll fetch thee back thy Love if thou canst but direct me which way the Villains went; at Guy's name

Tee

The Famous HISTOR Y.

Terry rebled, and rebelling full streng foiled his pale countenance, pale for loss of Blood, and rendred praise to Heaven for sending so worthy a Hero to his aid, in such a time of great distress, and then turning to Guy, said, worthy sir, whys have youchfased to pray my misfortune, thourgh that Lane they went by yonder Oak; this was no sooner said, but they heard the Lady screek, whereupon Guy ordered Herald to stay with the Earl, and dyess his woundes whilst he pursued the Russers, the which he had not long done before he over-took them, halling fair Otilie after a rude manner: To whom Guy thus began,

Villains, what dire mischief is this that your vile hands have done, for which your lives are forfeited to my revenge; restore the Lady, miscreants and appease my wrath ere it heap destruction on your wicked heads; to which they scoffingly replied, what would this vain-glorious fellow have, he thinks, cries another, to get a name by desperate folly, and that for being slain, in hopes of rescuing this Lady, the world will pity and lament his Fate; a third declared that he was surely mad, which so enraged him that bidding the Lady be of god cheer, (for that he came to fetch her back unto her Lord) he drew his dreadful Sword well known in War, and with it laid about so furiously, that scarce a stroke fell but he kill'd or mortally wounded one or other of them, bruising their Helms and Heads, breaking their Armour at such a rate, that in an hours space ten of them lay gasping on the ground, which the trembling Lady obseruing fell upon her knees and entreated Guy to hold his conquering hand and shed no more blood for her sake at which Guy moved with pity, put up his Sword, commanding the remaining six to ask the Lady forgiveness, and to thank her for their lives, the which they durst not refuse, so that Guy giving them two or three lusty knocks a piece with his sword in the scabbard dismissed them, bidding them tell their treacherous Lord that his name was Guy, and that he hoped ere long to meet him in Arms, and render him the reward of his Treachery; after which Guy caused the Lady, to mount behind him, so they rid to the place where they left the Earl, who seeing them riding towards him, saint as he was, came supported by Herald, to meet them, where falling down he embraced Guy's knees rendering him a thousand thanks, with inexpressible joy, joy, saying, He should be proud to dye fighting in his cause.

S : much renown in Arms the Hero won
That his great deeds through Europe now had run.

CHAP.

GUY Earl of WARWICK.

C H A P XI.

How Guy and Herauld went with the Earl to relieve his Father who was besieged by Duke Ottone and how Guy railed the Siege, routed the Dukes Army and kill'd him in single Combate.

Now night had cast her Sable bale over the earth, and left only the imperfect brightnes of the Moons silver beams to chear the droutie Globe, when Guy, Herauld, Terry, and Ossil his fair spouse, had through the Forrest, vast and wild, to travell many a mile before they came to any house or place of entertainment, but being so good Company they passed on joyfully, till coming to a rust of broad spreading Trees, (that cast haorrid shade, blacker then night it self) they heard a hideous noise and roaring caused by Beasts of Prey, who having left their Dens, followed the scent of blood, as Lions, Bears, Wolves, Tigers, Panthers, Leopards, and the like, when casting their eyes round they espied two Armed Knightz standing with their swords drawn on their Guards, and listening to the self same crys, who Guy and his associates coming up to, found to be two Kinsmen of the Earls, at which Terry embracing them, asked the cause that brought them into such a place so full of dread and danger, to whom they with a sigh reply. Alas my Lord! to tell you news you would not gladly hear, your Princely Father in his Castle is besieged by raving Ortons Power, begin with fifteen thousand men, the incensed Duke swearing to lay it level with the ground, and take your Fathers life in revenge of your taking away his Love.

The Famous HISTOR Y of

Alas said Terry (with a countenance that witnessed a thorow sense of grecy) I take his Love, just heaven knows my innocence, speak Olii, tell this Renowned man if I at any time procured the to break thy Faith, or ever tempted the to act ought against thy will; never (said the beauteous Lady) thou hast in all, that cruel Duke has wronged thy innocence; indeed he did make known to me his horrid Love, but his degun (when I withstood to yield) was to have Rabished me by force, but Heaven always pitying the distressed, prevented his black intent; thine I am and ever will be till death shall make a separation: Well spoke fair Lady, said Guy, in whose breast are such Sparks of Virtue, now I find that I must truly praise thy worth; 'tis for Love of a fair creature far distant from this place that I Wars dreadful task first undertaken and through a Sea of Blood have waded to obtain, and whom ere long I intend to see, & lay my Trophies (gained by Conquest) at her feet, since I have seen your constancy so perfect in their beings, fear not worthy Lovys take your ease.

Alas my Lord, said Terry, how can I be void of care and grief, when my dear Father (dear to me as life) must unavoidably be ruined for my sake, if any guilt there could be in the case, surely I must be innocent, come then life or death, Ile through the League break and free my Father, or else perish in the brave attempt.

Believe no more, said Guy, nor let restless thoughts distract your peace; these Arms shall force the daring Foe to leave the Siege, or like to thundering with death huel ruine on their guilty Heads, I in my Usage bear the triple fates, and wheresoe're I look, severe destruction marks my frowns, and death awaights to execute my will: long have I wished to meet the Duke in Arms, and now have found an opportunity unlooked for, and with as much joy go to this War as I would go to see my well pleased Phælice smile.

GUY Earl of WARWICK.

At these words the Earl revives, and put on cheerfulness whilst he and his fair spouse fell at Guy's feet, and would in humble thanks have kissed the ground but that he taking them up in his arms would not permit such reverence so to done to him a mortal Man, &c.

So they marched till they came within sight of the Castle, the which stood upon a rising hill; no sooner had Famine conveyed the sound through the Army that Guy was approaching, but the Commander had heard the dreadful Explorers his warlike hand had done, fled and left the Duke and some of his particular friend to order the forces, the Duke seeing himself in this plight gave the more desperate, vowing to continue the Siege, though ten thousand Devils were approaching to give the besieged aid.

Guy after having dispersed some few that lay against the Eastern Gate, with the Earl Herald and the rest entered the Castle, where finding the old Earl in much perplexity, Guy comforted him, as likewise Feiry, Herald, Cessil and the rest, relating what adventures had befall, at which the old Man somewhat revived Guy desired him to permit the Soldiers under his Command totally out upon the Foe, for said he now fear has made half the Conquest, I in a minutes time will finish it, which said, all with loud shouts cryed lead on, lead on, to Victory, when on a sudden the Gates on groaning hinges opened wide, and out they marched against the Foe, Guy in the front began the Battel with such courage and fury, spurred on by keen Revenge, that the slaughtered rout fell down on either hand, and his Men following it hard, in less then two hours space the amazed Tuscanes fled on all sides in confusion, leaving six thousand of their dead and dying friends upon the place, which the Duke seeing, in a rage desperately minded, was resolved to dye and not survive his infamy, whereupon he sought in every part for Guy, whirling his sword about to make him room, to whom he approaching, said, now I found thee who haunted me from place to place, and challenge thee in Arms to try whom Fortune has designed to favour, for death is better then an ignominious loss of honour: to whom Guy thus replied, proud Duke whose treacheries are not to me unknown, who causelessly sent lately to invade my life, know that I joy to meet thee; at which they rushed together, and like Lions fierce encountered each other, whilst from their Helms the sparks of fire flew, and rattling Armour echoed in the Skies till the Duke, wounded deep on the right side fainted and fell down for loss of blood, the which Guy seeing remembred that he was a Christian, and thereupon began to compassionat his unhappy fate, striving to recover him, but in vain: for after his having made a true confession of his many crimes, and asked pardon of all whom in his life he had offended, the grim Tyrant death prevailed & led him captive to the shades of night; at which with a relenting Mind after having delivered him to his friends to be honorably interred, returned to the Castle,

The Famous HISTORY of

where with great joy he was received of all, especially of Terry, Olli and the old Earl, but after having spent two days there with much delight, Herald and he took their leave and departed.

Still searching Glory's stage to court bright fame
And win themselves an everlasting name.

CHAP.

GUY Earl of WARWICK.

C H A P. XII.

How Guy killed a Monstruous Bore, and of the Honour done him by the Duke of Lorraine and Lobain, how he return'd to England and kill'd a monstrous Dragon in Northumberland, and the honour done him by the King, and his Reception by fair Phelice,

Guy and Herald having taken leave, proceeded onwards of their journey towards the Duke of Lorraine Court, but not having pass'd far, etc in the Forrest, they saw comynge towards them the hugest Bore that Earth e'er had, whose Eyes like two Beacons blaz'd, and on his back the horrid histles stood much like a Grove of spears: his Tusks whic' like two Ivory hilstones

and

The Famous HISTOR Y of

Steel, were at least two foot in length, his saws with blood and slaughter all besmeared, before whose rage, no Man, nor beast could stand ; but Guy nothing daunted, gave his horse to Herlaid, for to hold, and drawing out his mally blade went to met him, at whom the Beast coming with open mouth grunted horribly, Guy stood not to complement him but let fly with all his force, asif Jones Thunderbolts from broken clouds had fell, so that the Boxe never feeling such weighty stroaks nor smarting wounds till then, turned tail, and endeavoured to save himself by flight, but all in vain, for Guy pursuing, laid so hard upon his swinish head that down he fell, besmeared with blood, and with a horrid noise that made the Forrest shake breathed out his life, after which Guy hewing off his head, the which was at least one hundred weight, bore it upon his Launce to the Duke of Lovains Court, where no sooner arriving, but the Duke commanded all his Drums, Trumpets, Clarions, and other instruments of War to welcome him, going with his Nobles to congratulate his safe return, with all the imaginable exhalations of joy, and ten thousand happy wishes, sending notice of his arrival to th: Duke of Lorain, who with all the Nobility of his Court, in very splendid Equipage came to embrace the world's admired Man, and to present him with gifts and honours, though not suitable to his deserts, the two Dukes making a publick Feast for the space of ten days for all commers whatsoever.

But Guy having been so long absent from the bright beauty who was to be the reward of his dreadful toyl, was much desirous to return for England his Native place, long it was before he could obtain their licences to depart, they still preparing one noble exercise or other to delay him, till at last he opened to them his Love, giving them to understand it was for that he so long had roamed about the world and undertaken enterprizes so perillous, against which they could find no argument, but ordering one of the best Ships immediately to be rigged and fitted, they unwillingly dismissed him after having accompanied him to the Sea side, saying, Go and prosper thou Renowned Worthy of the world, thrice happy is the land that gave thee birth, and more happy she that must enjoy thee in her Arms; may Victory awaigh thee wheresoe'r thou goest, and crown thy brows with new fadding Bays.

For which Guy having returned his humble thanks, gave order to hoist up Hall, and having a god forewind, in four days touched on English ground.

The which the King no sooner hearing of but he sent several of his Nobles to desire his Company at York, where then he kept his Court, Guy hearing that it was his Sovereigns pleasure, stood not to dispute, but joyfully accompanied them, though he had rather have gone to his inestimable jewel, the fair Phælice.

GUY Earl of WARWICK.

First no sooner Herauld and he were conducted to the Kings presence, where he sat in his Throne with all his Nobles standing round about him, but they offered to kneel as was their duty, but the King forbade it, and rising from his Chair of State, took them in his arms and embraced them, saying, worthy Champions, by whom my Realme is famous through the world, and especially by you sir Guy, whose Arms have done such wonders as amaze mankind, before whose arm he haughty foes still bowed their stubborn necks; Monsters and Tyrants by thy prowess fell, and Armies scattered, strewed the field with slain, matchless in war, in Arms not to be equalled, Fames brazen Trumpet hath thy worth proclaimed, and thee the everlasting Monument of true Heroick greatness stiled, spreading thy mighty Deeds unto the utmost corners of the Land, thou the Oppressors scourge, and the oppresed's shield, receive such favours as a King can give.

At which Guy bowing low, and returned all humble thanks, he thus began Dread Sovereign Lord, to whom I all Allegiance owe, your praises of my worth are too great for my Deserts, but could there be an enterprize found out greater difficulty, wherein your most obedient subject could do ought to merit the least of these labours your Highnesse heaps upon me, I should think my self for ever blest a happyng so infinite I should be proud to purchase with my Life.

Alas said the King and with that he sighed) there is an enterprize of dangerous consequence within the limits of this Isle, but I must hide it from the least in such a dangerous attempt I lose the belt of Subjects, and thou at home have thy Herwick deedes eclipsed by foil or death.

My ever honoured Lord said Guy, conceal not your Princeely thoughts, give me the danger whatsoever it is, and I will with open Arms go joyfully to meet it were it the deadliest that ever Fare devised.

Then since thou wilest know what English Hero tis a dreadfull Dragon bred amongst the Rocks in Northumberland of a monstrous size, who for this month past has infested all that Country killing both Man and Beast, so terrible to behold, that all the people within ten miles of his Cave have left their habitations desolate, and so hath many of their flocks and heards, the which he preys upon, and gluts his venomous jaws with slaughter; many of our Knights have gone to Combate him, but with such fatal succels, that either wounded with his mortal sting, or pownded with the infectious air he breaths, they have either dyed upon the place, and there served to gorge his hellish Maw or soon after, and so curving is the world, that if he sees any number of Armed men, together, he wi lnot descend from his Rocks, but there abide, or with expanded wings beat himself alest in the air: I tell you not this because I would have you hazard your life in so perillous an enterprize, no I had rather that

Coun

The Famous HISTORY of

Coynty shold iye wast then you expelld unto mortall danger.

To whom Guy thus replied, Most redoubled Sovereign, the newes you tell me has alreaday filled me with more joy then can be well exprest, that I that have livid so many Nations from the Pests, now in the pumpe of all my strength before the seeing of this, in which I first breathed my vital air, no, may it but please your Highnes to offer me a Conduit where to find this Monster, or rather scion, I now by all the faours that your Majestie has heaped upon me, that before the Sun has twice rounded this Isle of Earth, his head upon a Launce, salt fredo, shall to your Majestie be brought, mazemontuous he cannot be then him whom I bereaved of life in the Levantine Forrest.

At Guy's earnest request, the King ordred twelve Knights to wait upon him, of whom H. Radclif was one, who had beene not to leave him in any adventure whatsoever, wherupon Guy took his leave, and the King blesseed many viellings upon him, wishing him prosperous success, and that he might be victorious over the destroying Dragon.

No sooner was Guy departed on his jorney, but a Messenger from the great Council then assembled at Lincoln, came to give his Majestie to understand that his Pretente was required there, about decydng a busyness of much concernment wherupon he posted thither, where so a while we must leave him and follow Guy into Northumberland.

Where being arriued, he no sooner came within haen of the Rock, wherein was the Dragons Cave, but he found the Mangled Carcasses of Men and Beasts ly scattered on the plain, some halfe devoured and others swollen with Peysen; at which sight not daunted in the least, he forwards rides, bidding his Knights stay behinde at some distance, least the Monster leaving him shoud set on them, not so well able to withstand his force.

Habing advanced wthyn a furlong of the Cave, the Dragon espies him, & greedy of his prey, with broad wing out-spread, that he drove the air around him like a Whirl-wind as he flew, came at Guy staring on him with eyes that seemed to burn like Lamps of fire, hissing horribly, Guy having set his Launce in his rest met him with a full career, and hitting him just upon the brest, his scaly harness burst the Launce into an hundred peices without so much as making the least impression; at which he drew his sword, and with redoubled force laid at the Monsters head, whiles he extended his forked sting, disgorging black poison on the ground, and with a dreadfull yell made at him with his Teeth and claws, sometimes on the Earth, sometimes aloft in the air he assails the Champion, who watching his opportunity as he was rising, struck him a full blow under the wing that spoiled his flight, the swarthy blood gushing out a man

GUY Earl of WARWICK.

main, of which Guy taking the advantage, ran him in so deep, that reaching of life's last with horrid yells that made the Rocks resound, he breathed out his last, whilst from his mouth that opened wide, was seen to issue forth a flame of fire ; his head with such labour he hewed off, and stiring it upon the Tuan theon of his Sوار, herides back to his Knights, who, overjoy'd at his success, welcom'd him and sang him the most Champion, most Renown'd on Earth, placing a wreath of Laurel on his head, and so rid on till they came to York, but having notice of the King's departure they stayed not there but posted to Lincoln, where they were received with all the signs of joy imaginable, the gazing crowds from all parts came to see the mighty Champion so much praised by Fame,

The King no sooner heard of his coming, but rising from the Council board, attended by all the Nobility present, he went to meet him, when beholding the Monstrous head he blessed himself, saying, it was surely nace to d. vour all mankind, such gazing Eyes, and rows of Monstrous Teeth, Rabid jaws, armed with scale of Adamant, and forked fangs, whose points exceeded the sharpest steel ; and at least a yard in length, from which, laid he, hereafter Heaven defend this Isle ; with that he gave order to one of his Knights to receive it at Guy's hands, and afterwards embraced him with unsign'd joy, saying, well art thou worthy of our Royal labours, thou most Renowned of Men, whose brave Exploits shine now as bright as noon day Sun, Honour's first born thou art, and Eldest son of Fame, how shall we express thy praises, whose all Conquering arm no power of mortals can withstand.

The which Guy modestly endeavoured to excuse, but in vain, for the more he excused, the more he was honoured, the King sending two Knights skilled in Linnick to take the just proportion of the Dragon's Carkals, the which they did, and found it to be thirty foot in length, and alike in all proportion ; the Picture being hung up in Warwick Castle, but of that more hereafter : By this time Fame had convey'd to Phelice the news of Guy's being with the King at Lincoln (she red she having heard before) delays not, but mounting her Pal-stry came attended with several Ladies thither, where finding Guy, who little expected her there, they embrac'd each other, and wept for joy ; Alas said Phelice, my Love couldst thou neglect me thus, as to be in England so long without letting me know, 'tis sure thou hast forgot thy vows, or were they only feigned ; to whom Guy answered mild : Bright center of my soul, on whom all my joys depend, and all the dreadful torles of War that I have undergone seem small, since thou in recompence axoyd'st me Love ; look on me my dear joy, my faithful heart is ever thine, it was still with thee in all the dangers that I underwent, thou art the only he this Land contains that willingly at

The Famous HISTOR Y of my Arrival I would first have seen, but being sent for by the King, at my first setting foot on shor, I was obliged to obey my Sovereigns Command, and after freed the land by slaying of the hugest Dragon that the earth e'r had.

No more my Lord, said Phelice, I have heard of all thy brave Exploits, such hazards you shall never undertake for me again, I am now thine own, in Loves soft Wars we will hereafter contend; so saying she wept for joy, and Guy embrac'd her, smothering her Tears with Kissis.

The Marriage day propos'd, Guy gives the King to understand the summ of all, how for Love of beauteous Phelice he had undertaken those enterprizes, and waded through a Sea of blood, desiring that his Majesty would acquaint Earl Robinds with the same, and procure his free consent, for as yet he knew not of their Lovers.

This the King promised to performe, and that himself his Queen, and all the Court would grace the Wedding with their presence, the which was appointed to be at Warwick, the Queen sending Phelice many Jewels and other rich Presentes and all imaginable preparations great and costly were prepared for entertaining of the Royal Guest.

Whilst Fame did loudly sing his mighty praise
And Crown'd his head with never fading Bayes,

CHAP.

GUY Earl of WARWICK.

CHAP. XIII.

How Guy and Phelice are joynd in Wedlock, and of their splendid entertainment, how afterw.rd. tie vowe a Pilgrimage, and Travels to the Holy Land, how in his way he kill.s Amarant a monstrous Giant, and delivers the P.foners under his Tyranny kept in tortures.

The happy Nuptial day long looked for being come, the King and Queen with all the Court to Warwick strait repair, attended and adorned with all the pompous Magnificence that can be imagined on so great an occasion.

The Famous HISTORY of

Earl Robard no sooner understanding by the King's Letter that Guy was arrived in England, and that for the Love of his braueous daughter he had undertaken the dreadfull task of War, and Com. ats fierce abroad, and the at home, and that he was come to Warwick to ask his consent, and being overjoyd he went to meet him.

Guy perceiving him come towards him, bowed himself to the ground, where upon the Earl halte, and taking him in his arme, embrased him with all the expressions of Love and Friendship; Guy no sooner asking his consent, but his reply was, that he shold ever be bound to bles heauen for inclining to so Heroick and brave a Man to ask that of him which he himself had so often wished would come to pass, and that his generation shoulde be to famoued by an alliance with the worthiest Champion that e're trod the Globe; for which Guy returned humble thanks; and therupon Phelise being called, blushing with virgin Modesty, freely, and to her no small content yielded.

Business being brought to this passe, the Earl gave order for the sumptuous Entertainment; commanding the Keepers of the Parks to prepare a hundred fat Bucks, which were served up with all the choicest dainties of the Land after the Churches Seal had joyned the lovely pair, Wine flowing round in such abundance, for to entertain the Royal Guest, that it was to be admires the Nation could afford so much, all manner of Fowls and Fishes eatable, that the Air or Sea contained: so that Abasuerus when he feasted all the Eastern Provinces could not outdo this; the Banquet ended, melodious instruments of Musick were brought, & the Ladies of Honour, & Lords, attendants on the Court, danced before the King and Queen, the Earl and his Countess, Guy and his fair Bride, who deckt with Jewels, late bright as the Morning Star, nor was Guy's one Father and Mother wanting to be there: after the Dances ended, several Plays were presented and Songs sung containing Guy's Heroick Acts, to the infinite satisfaction of all the Assembly, every one joying the Married pair, whilst Hymen descending in a Cloud, sung to soft Musick as followeth,

SONG.

GUY Earl of WARWICK.

S O N G.

1.

Happy for ever Blessed be Whom Heaven has joyn'd in Unity,
Let Peace and Honour still attend
And Joys, such joyes as know no end.
Still live in Love, and banish care Whil'st I pronounce you happy are.

2.

Great man of War whom Beauty charms
Embrace thy Goddes in thy Arms,
Live Live for ever in delight Loves foster Wars does now invite
To Mars no more dread homage pay Tis Love tis Love you must obey.

3.

Loves pow'r commands,you must submit
So has the Deity thought fit
Gainst pointed Beauty,Armour's vain
Through it Love wounds with pleasing Then happy in each others blifs (Pain
Make Earth make Earth a Paradice.

After the Song ended,Masquerades were performed, and all the noble sports that could be imagined to be iight the lenses; the Festival continuing for the space of ten days, but not long after, this joy was eclipsed by the death of the noble Earl, who dyed of a violent Fever,to the unspeakable grief of all men, making Guy sole Heir of all his Lands and Lordships; the King confirming upon him the Title of Earl of Warwick, he being thenceforwards ranked in all admitt-ables of Council and other meetings amongst the Lords and Peers of the Nation, & and highly esteemed of all, &c.

The Famous HISTOR Y of

But to see in the mid of joy and delight what sudden Eclipse (at which the world not a little wondered) overspread the bright sun-shine of infant bliss, for Guy remouing over the past actions of his life, began seriously to consider with himself what an Ocean of Blod he had waded through to purchase his Beauteous Bude; for which being smitten with remorse of Conscience, he fell into a deep Melancholy, and often retired in private to bewail his sins committed against Heaven, saying That to gain honour and Renown to please a Woman, he has provoked the just incensed God of all the Earth and that his Crimes were many, great and gredious; and that without speedy Repentance they would proove his eternal ruine, with many other for my expiations of deep sorrow and Contrition; so that his warlike eyes that were wont to affreare, now strowed with bryng Tears, whilc lights and groans declared the Ajoyng he strove under.

Wher Phælice one day having watched him to his retirement, observing him in lachrimose wise, entreated to know the cause of so sudden alteration, saying if she had any wayz offended, she woulde upon her knees, beg pardon, & be farr for to transgres no more in the like nature: and with that she tenderly wept, whose Tears Guy not being able to behold, raised in his arms and began to comfort her saying, weep not bryght Angel thou fairest and deuinest of thy Sex, in whom alone such vertues dwell as can equal the best of women dwelling on the earth.

No my adored Mistress, tis for my boundless sinz that now turn back upon my Conscience in these nat:ve ugliness and vile deformity, whose numbers are as numberless as Sandz on the Birrachian shores, the flower of youth and strength I have vainly spent, puffed up with fond imaginacions and the love of thae, in a red Sea of blood have I sailed about the world, and with this hand laid thousandz silent, pale in deathys cold Tombs, who else might now have been alive; but thou art innocent of such impieties, twas fortunate succell and my ambition that prompted me to such extream illz, the which I now with Tears lament and must to Heaven make satisfaction, for a long and weary Pilgrimage unto the Holy Land I have resolved to take, my vows are past and shall not be recalled, therefore my lovely Phælice weep no more, tis to the holy Sepulcher ile go, and see the place where my dear Saviour for sinfull Mans redemption humbled himself so low as to abide in, after his having taken our nature upon him, and where he suffered and laid down his precious life for us unworthy miserable wretches, who make it our chiel ends to dis obey his will, So saying, he sighed and groaned within himself, at which Phælice again bewept her beauteous face with Tears, the which he smothering with a Kiss, and thus mildly did proced; alas my fair one, for thy sake I could willing-

G V T Earl of W A R W I C K.

I stay at home, but for the sake of my immortal Soul (more dead) I must perform my dows ; live clart my Phoenix like the Turtle Dove, and win immortal praises by thy vertuous life : Remember the Renowned Women of former times, as Penelope, Eufrida, and Editha, with many others, who after being married, account'd Chastity their greatest pride, containing all desires of marriage blis.

I know thou art so much composed Divine, that thou canst equal, if not exceed the n all ; for sure it is twas for thy sake, and to procure thy Love, that I trampled upon Crowns and Scepters, forcing Princes and Potentates to yield their Breaths, though I must confess the fault was only mine, and thou art innocent ; but alais too long I delay to make satisfaction : For my guilt Armoye ly there, and all my Conquests he forgot, in a Pilgrims Meed I now will Travel the world with weary Steps : Come my dear and gentle Purchice deliver me thy King, and take thou mine, the Pledge of our dear remembrance and Love, the which beholding, though distant in my miles divided by rough Waves, let us think on each other ; and if e're I return to see this my Native Land, I'll send it thee that thereby thou maist have knowledge of my arrival, he had no sooner ended, but drowned in tears that burst from her stary Eyes, she wrung her hands complaining against her cruel Fates, thus soon to separate her from her Lord, begging on her knees his stay, but finding his Resolution fixed too deep to be removed, she unwillingly consented, promised to have him ever in remembrance, ensoring him the same by her, sounknown to any, she accompanied him to the Ship in which he was to pass for Italy, and there with a thousand endearing Kisses took her leave of him, not knowing where she ever shou'd behold him more, and so with sad & heavy cheer she return'd to Warwick Castle, where for a while we must leave her & follow Guy into Italy, where suffering many storms at Sea, he arrived safe, & Landing only with a staff & Scrip travell'd over the Country pensive and alone, passing many a wild Forrest and Desert place, till having gone about two hundred miles close by a murmuring Brook o'respread with Populars & Oliers he espred an aged Knight sitting & greatly bewailing his misfortune, Crying alas ! what now but woe and misery, which nought but death can put a period too , cruel was the Tyrant that to bereave me of all my Sons, not leaving me so much as one to support & comfort me in my declining age ; Nay more , what horrour seizes me to think the miseries they endure, by his Tyrannick rage their deaths are lingring , but mine shall not be so.

With that he drew his Sword and being about to fall theron, Guy stepped to him and hindred the intended violence, laying, Reverend Sir, make known to me the cause of this your greef that has dysea you upon such despair, if it be in the power of Man to right your wrongs, perhaps I may be the Man that will reverse your woes.

The Famous HISTORY of

At which the Knight stiring his eyes on Guy, with a deep sigh thus spake, Alas! Pugnai, thou art not able to give ease unto my grief, 'tis death alone ould cure my plaint & not so rath I aid God, but tell the cause, you know not what hidden force these Arms contain why then laid he, kind Strander, since I will understand my misfortune, know that noway Castle prison are spared, Woodes one Am rann a Gigantike Tyrant, of them a monstrous size, as Earth
I think never brought forth before, who feeding upon human flesh comes all that pass these Woods, and other beastes of all sorts, sent to her hardy Prison, in which not only of Gentlemen but Landes Lasses ye at this time hold Captive at least one hundred, the Women for his Lust and the Men for his Wantone put to various torments; my only daughter haplye staying this day, was taken by the Monster, upon which my affran Sons, desirous to rescue her, went Armed to fight against the Tyrant, but not being able to withstand his force were all taken Prisoners, whose Lives I hear, for their sakers who he spares, but every dayes devises for them newe torment: now thou hast heard me out, what thinkst thou? have I not cause enough for death.

To whom Guy thus Replyed. Alas! Sir, I pity you, yet am glad I came so luckily to save your Life, and free your Sons if yet alive: could you perform so meritorious a work laid the Knight, with humble thanks to you ide his the ground and kles this happy day, but I fear 'tis altogether vain for to attempt, for many haue whose Skuls lyce scattered round the dreadfull place: Fear not said Guy, lend me but your Sword and Armeour, I'll try that fortunie which has never turned against me yet whilste you stay here, and pray for my success:
So saying, he departed, and coming to the Castle Gate, thundred at it so loud as made the hollow walks to echo, at which the dreadfull Giant roused, came forth Armed from head to foot, bearing a weighty Club some six foot long, and seeing Guy, stared on him with Eyes that seemed to sparkle like fire; saying, sirrah, how durst you thus presume to hinder my repose? know you not 'tis death for to approach this place, much more to be bold, it may be so said Guy, were your arms equal to your will; but it was to seek you that drew me to this place, know Tyrant 'tis not your monstrous size I dread, to which the Gyant storming, replied to an ill purpose art thou come, for with thy flesh will I feast the Fowls of the air, whilst my self shall quaff thy blood, and with that laid at Guy with his Hally Club, who nimblly avoided the coming stroaks and drew his Sword, so that a dreadfull sight began, which long continued doubtful, till through excess of heat Amarant began to faint which Guy perceiving, redoubled his force and hewed upon his Armeour till he dinted and cut it through in several places, which the crafty Giant finding, the better to recover breath, feigned threst, and besought Guy to let him dynt of the

GUY Earl of WARWICK.

the adjacent River, and not to take the advantage of Natures enforcement, to which Guy readily condescended, saying, Drunk thy fill, that so I may have the greater task to Conquer thee, who when subdued, shall have no excuse, to say Herodick Guy.

And Amaran特 Great to the River hasted, drinking largely of the swelling flood, whilst Guy stood prepared to receive him at his return. The Giant having ended his draught and quenched his thirst, takes up his Club and comes at him with all his force, rest having added fresh vigour; the which Guy eschewing, nimbly avoided the furious stroak, which falling on the ground entred above a foot therin so that before he could recover his stroak, Guy struck him full on the head, which made him recoil six huge paces, but wheeling about he charged a gain with greater force then before, so that the Combate having continued about the space of four hours, Guy grew thirsty, desiring the like leave that he soye he had granted, to which Amaran特 scoffingly replied, he never was so great a fool as to receive his loc, but to take all advantages; this so enraged Guy that with force exceeding he smote upon the Gyants Crest, and with thre blows broght him to the ground, who falling like a Ciclops made the Earth to quake and being down cryed out for quarter, but in vain; for Guy remembryng his hale ingratitudo,immediately lopped off his frightful head, which divided from the Monstrous trunk he stred on the Gates, and taking the Key he entred the Castle, where he found the wofullit Spectacles that e'r his eyes beheld; tender Ladies in dark Dungeons, living for many years on humane flesh, nay forced to eat their Husbands, or their nearest friendys; such was the rigour of the merciless Tyrant.

These he released, but going farther, found a mally doze on brazen Pillars hang, he not having the keys forced them open with iron instruments he found in the Castle where he had no sooner entred but he beheld such sights as made him start with horrour,above sixty Perlons(among which were the Knights Sons) hanged up by the heels,some with their heads downwards,other by the Waists, some by the middle or privy members,all looking as pale as death,who no sooner hearing the Gate open, but supposed it had been the Gyant coming to torment them (as his use was to make himself pastime)whereupon they with lamentable cries began to beseech him to put them out of their pains: But contrary, Guy gently took them down who though weaknes were no ways able to stand,when he had done this, he went and called the Knight, who no sooner entred and saw what Guy had dene, but falling at his feet he rendred him ten thousand thanks, but Guy taking him up, embrased him, saying, he alwayz had vowed to right the wronged, and help the oppressed against the mighty oppresor; this he having sayd, and therunderstanding he was their deliverer, with tears of joy

The Famous HISTOR Y of

the day that gave him birth, and a thousand times more this in which he released them from their torments; after which Guy having consoled them all he could, delivered the Keys of the Castle to the Knight, with strict charge carefully to look to the distressed Ladies, and the rest, he put off the Armour, and taking his gown and his staff, departed towards Jerusalem, with many a weary step over Hills and Rocky Mountains, through Woods and Forests where the dreadfull wild Beasts roared around him, solitary all alone, and often sitting down in the shade, or by some murmuring brook, would with tears bewail his sins, and condemn himself for the many great transgressions had committed, lamenting his youthful follies, whilst Wildings and Berries were his daily food, and water from the Christal Spring sufficed for drink to quench his thirst, whom now we must bewailing his depraveties, and return into England to take a view how Paclice bears the absence of her wan-ding Lord.

Whilst through untroden mazes he does stray
To Jude's Land his sins to purge away.

CHAP.

GUY Earl of WARWICK.

CHAP. XIV.

How Guy's departure out of England is lamented, and of strange Adventures that befel in the Holy Land, how at his Return he routed Alaric the Saracens' Army, and restored Earl Terry to his Lordships, afterwards returning into England which he found almost destroyed by the Danes.

NO sooner did the King and the Nobility hear that Guy was departed the Land on a Pilgrimage, but they were struck more with admiration, wondering that he could so soon leave the fairest creature England had, for a lonely and solitary life, yet commend his Piety that began such early Repentance and set his Soul at far greater value then all his Honours, or glittering Treasures, so that for this he'll gain as much applause as before he had done for his victories,

The Famous HISTOR Y of

In the mean while Phalice penitent & shunned all converse unless it were concerning her Lord, keeping her self reserved and Chast, seldom being seen abroad, the Queen and several great Ladies, came several times to bair her, and to perswade her out of her melancholy, but in vain; she would not hearken to tales of mirth, but often retiring into her Closet, she would bewail his absence, saying, Alas where wanders now my Guy, what unknown Change holds that far-famed Man whom Europe lately held in Admiration: but now unknown in poor array he traces the Desarts thinking on me, whilst Tears gush from his brimful Eyes, and sitting down under some spreading shade bemoans my lonely state, wishing himself, oft in my arms. Oh why did we ever part, for this short moments kiss that was scarce worth his thoughts, Did he undertake such toil and six years spend in dreadful War, alas! could n't he be my Lord that could leave me thus forlorn, bereft of joy, and comfortless, even in the dawn of Happiness, overcasting with thick Clouds of sorrow the morning Sun, when all my hopes were growing perfect; ah cruel Fate to me but it is for the sake of thy immortal Soul which makes me bear it with the less rigour, and be more patient in thy absence, hoping one day to behold thy much beloved face again, but where e're thou art I know thy thoughts are fixed upon me, thy heart is oft in England, though thou art far remote, tis sure thou canst not forget thy Phalice whom once thou lovedst so dear, no I know thou canst not, I should wrong thy Clerues should I but imagine it; Oh my Lord couldst thou but know how sensible I am of the great dangers that you must needs hazard your self in, whilst through wildernes large and wide you travel, destitute of food, and lye abnoxious, now unacquainted, to the devouring jaws of each Beast of Prey, and your absence hath tortured thus my poor bleeding heart with fear which is worse then death it self, but wheresoeuer thou goest this my comfort my soul attends thee, though my body from the watery Globe's divided Leagues without number.

So saying, her eyes burnt out with Pearly Tears, and sobs stopped the passage of her voice, refusing all pleasant Wines or sumptuous Diet, her delight being only to feast the Poor, and daily to relieve with her own hand such as came for Charity, whilst her Lord having travelled through Arania and Palauina, after many a weary step arrived at the long wished for place, the which to visit in those times, was held sufficient to expiate all sins committed till that time, &c.

Guy took curious Observations both of the Sepulchre wherein the Aramaian deposited the glorious body of our blessed Saviour inhumanely put to death by the cruel Jews, after that, the ruined Temple wherein he taught, as likewise Mount Calvary or Golgotha, where his precious blood was shed for sin-

GUY Earl of WARWICK.

fit man; then th^e Relics of the Cross, the Crown of Thorns and St George and many other memorials kept in the Church, now built upon the Holy Sepulchre by the Patriarch. Having stayed there about some twenty years with great devotion, he felt a natural decay, knowing that his ill beseid Death en^t; and being much desirous to lay his Bones in his Native Land, and to see his verious Title before Death crost his eyes with long benigitory slumber; he takes his leave to tread back again those ways that he had run before: Wandering through divers Countries and Regions barefoote & thin, and when night came repose in some hollow Cave that Nature had sacerd with Pumice, or beneath some spreading Oak, laying his Head upon the Hewe Oak: so passing on by degrees till he came into Ital, where long he had not travelled before he met with his old acquaintance Tom Terry, whose Father being dead, Duke Osroon Son, by name Amantius, had invaded his Territories, and having overthrown him in three huge Battels, had taken from him his Lordships and Dominions in the revenging his Father, slain in C^o., and himself being forced to fly to save his life (not understanding his selfe be of good cheare, so as I am an Englishman said he, I run as the right, and bear the Usurper back to his own Country, at the name of an Englishman Terry revives, and with a bap fetcheth high, i.e. Willof^h. But there was an Englishman once so much my friend as to love him, and his brotheres sake from the alluring Tuscans; but I fear death, has laid him lowe in some secret place, he not having been heard of in these parts for many years, his name was Guy a man reverenced above the rest of men for valour, boldnes, and daring Guy (one having so altered his Warlike facies when he was an infant willing to make himself known) Most noble Earl I kn^t d^e the man you speak of, and oft have seen him in dreadfull Battels tryed, still though the bloody felds I ranged and chased the Foe with equal success breaking in these audacious wars, he desired the Earl to fetch him a suit of the highest proofe of armor and a strong sword, and then to muster up what Men he had left, and let the chent to Heaven, in all this he was readily obeyed, so that in a shire span every thing was compleat so the March, Guy carrying the Crayn^t, to bumb aloud, at the noise of which some of the Tuscans exceeding the number of a Cor-ret of the Calle, saw some thousand men (all the remaine of twentie thousand) the rest being stainmarching toward them, of which the admiral^t was in bus, who conjecturing it to be Terry, commanded his Souldiers to arm, and opening the gate of the Towne issued out in good order about fifteen thousand strong, marching in three Battalia^s, which Terry obseruing would have fled, but Guy harned him on, saying himselfe would begin the Battel and shewe the whole Army thorough long it was not before they cam^t up close to cast after the Tuc-

The Famous H I S T O R Y of

such a shout as made the hills to Echo, upon which Guy having drawn out one thousand of his choicest men, ordered to sound the Charge, and thereupon with force exceeding, engaged the first Embattled Squadron of the enemies main Body, who dreamed of no such fury, and broke through their Ranks disordering and putting them into great confusion, whilst Guy laid round about him, and at every stroke one or other slew: in the mean while Terry was not idle, for animated by Guy's example, he on the other side charged Amantus with the like success, so that nothing but slaughter raged through the Plain, the conflict continuing dreadful for the space of four hours, when the Tuscans found themselves infinitely worsted began to shrink, and by straining fell into so great a disorder that their Commanders could not draw them up, which Guy perceiving, pressed on cutting his way through Troops and Regiments, and making such dreadful havock that though Amantus with many of his trusty Friends going through the Army entreated them to take courage, yet could he not restrain their flight, so that all retreat to the town, being cut off by two thousand that wheeled to the right, they fled confus'd to the Woods and Hills scattering themselves one by hand.

Guy and the Earl having pursued them till night returned where they found the Citizens come out to meet the Earl, with the Keys, expressing great joy, for those that were left to guard it hearing of the overthrow durst not attend the Segual, but abandoned it and fled, which they no sooner perceived, but they entered in great Triumph, and there that night the Earl entertained Guy with all imaginary splendor, even weeping for joy to be so unlooked for restored, desiring to know his name that had wrought such wonders in his behalf, but refused to make known who he was, nor did he as formerly, take any delight in Applauses, or entertainment, but getting up betimes the next morning, lest the City unknown to the Earl or any of his Attendants, so journeying to the Sea side, he found a Ship just going for England, in which he joyfully Embarked, the Tidell being bound for Bristol (which was then likewise a place famous for Merhandize) in eighteen days they arrived there, where Landing they heard most welcome and unwelcome Newes, for Canute King of Denmark in a pretended quarrel for the loss of his Father, who putting to Sea in a small Boat and a Tempest immediately arising he was driven on this shore, and being taken by one of the Barons of the Cinque Ports, was carried before the King, who nobly entertained him, and for his great skill in Hawking made him his chief Faulconer, which raised such envy in him that he was displeased when that accouer, th' one day taking his opportunity in a Forest he slew him and fled into France.

GUY Earl of WARWICK.

Whiche Murther being laid to the Kings charge, who was altogether ignorant of it, the Danes under their aforesaid Captain, and several others under pretence of Revenge, but moze out of greedines for Prey and Plunder, Landed with above twenty thousand men, and after them ten thousand more, with which they ravaged and laid wast the Country, deltreyng with fire and sword all before them, ravishing Women and Virgins and then rippling them up alive dashing Babes against the ground, and all other horrid impetries that can be imagined; so terrible they dealt; that the people fled before them, dreading them worse than a Pestilence; the King having gathered together the English Forces, had fought several Battles in which he was worsted, and thereupon retired with his friends to Winchester, a Town then so strong that it was impossible to take it unless by starving, powder, that hellish Engine, then lay deep hidden in the secrets of the Earth, and was not formed to belch destruction to mankind, against whiche the Danes having drawn all their Forces, besieged it almost round, there being no passage in or out but at the Western Gate Guy upon this sad News & distress of his King & Country thither he makes with all speed, resoluing to raise the Siege or lose his Life,

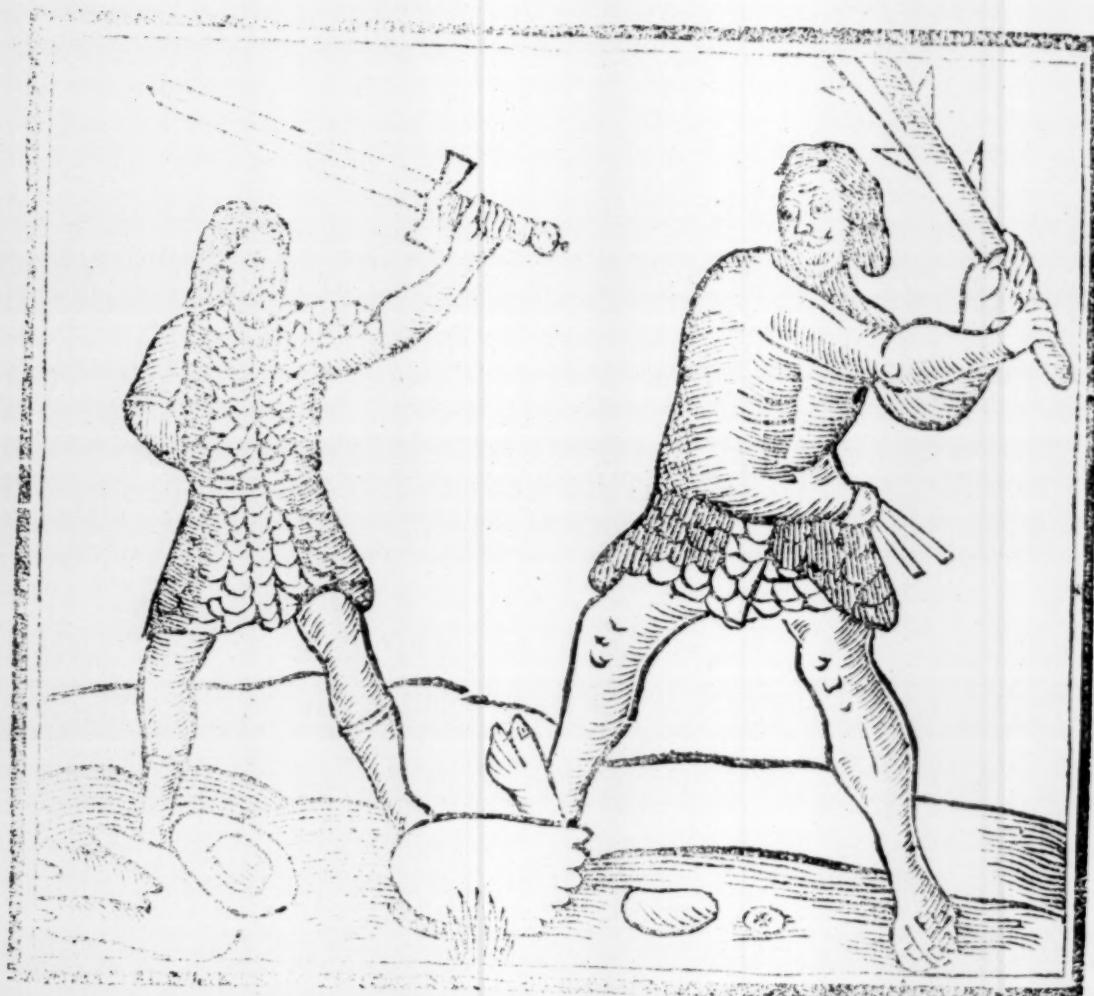

Nor age detains him but through guarding Foes
He Fights his way and deals them terms of blowes,

CHAP.

The Famous HISTORY of

CHAP. XV.

How the King being besieged at Winchelster, Guy undertook to fight with Col-hum a Monstrous man, kills him and routs the Danish Army, forcing them to a great flight; and so the Land, and then betakes himself to his solitary abey where he lived many years unknown.

GUY no soon after cutting the Town, but he went upon the Walls to view the Germans forces how they lay encamped, what their Numbers were, not in the least making himself known to any: Long he had not been there, but out from a Tent placed on the Northside, came proudly strutting, an Armed Gyant of Monstrous size, being at least twelve foot in height & eight in thickness, he being the man that had so terrified the English & made great slaughter on them in all the Battels that were fought, none being able to resist his strength, & still fled before him, he wearing underneath his high proofed Armour a Shirt of Mail, & bearing a great two edged Sword: Long he has not stalked like a huge Colossus on the plain, but disdainfully aloud he called unto the King, & thus began to revile, Athelstane now no more King of England, but our Prisoner, mured up within these walls, which we're long will level with the ground in vain it is to trust to your defence, come forth & try your manhoods in the field, by: here like Men & so perhaps you may purchase to your selves the names of valiant but if like Cowards there you stay, till we slaughter you within your walls, & roast you in the flaming Town, Infamy unto posterity will blot the false fain'd English renown, which has spread wide into the world, a report, a report of such deeds as you never durst adventure: 'Tis agreed by all the Captains of our Army, that is amongst all your Nobles, you can find a man that dares to Combate me, in which Combate if he remains victorious, they will not only raise the Siege but depart the Land & leave you in Peace & quietness; so said the proud insulting Foe, at which their Armies shouted loud & gave him great applause, At which daring affront, the King being much perplexed turned to his Nobles, demanding if any of them would adventure on the Noble Enterprize: Remember said he how great Goliah fell by David's hand; & shall this Pagan outbrave us thus, for shame my Lords let it not be known: 'Tis Heavens cause we fight, for the defence of the true Christian Faith, as well as for our Countrey's honour; who can tell but God may have put this offset into their hearts, either to free us from distress, or to deliver them into our hands: If none will undertake it, I my self will Encounter with the haughty Foe, and if I perish Heavens Will be done. So said the King, but all around stood mute, looking on each other who should first Reply, which Guy (who had stod all that while undiscovered) observing, with anger groaned, and coming to the King most humbly besought his Majestie to confer on him the Honour of the Combate, to which the King (not meaning who it was, for all supposed Guy then dead, by reason he had not been heard of in so long a time) made answer, Alas poor Pilgrim, for so thou seemest to be, thou art not able to contend with one so Mighty, I had a Champion once, whom Death has now snatch'd from me, on whose head I would have ventured my Life and Crown, Oh---- Renowned Guy for ever lost, thou wouldest not have seen thy Sovereign thus affronted & abused, wth that he turn'd & wept whose Royal Tears grieved Guy so to behold still with supplications, pressing him that he would give consent: Saying, Dread Lord, though I'm now un-

GUY Earl of WARWICK.

The Famous H I S T O R Y of

shown to you, yet trust my Courage for this once, and by Heaven, I told before the Sun descends beneath the Western deep, he that has livid you now shall pay his Life for the affront, at which Heretich spach the King had amiss, & wondered at the greatness of his saying, I have accepted thee, thou shalt be the man on whom I benter England, & immediately ordered his vpon Armette to be brought, whiche Guy ressing put on, least he shold be knowne, & gilding on a mosy sword came to the King to take his leave, whiche the Nobles seeing, began to offer their seruices, but the King would not permit them now but embracing Guy unknowne, laid, So then worthy Man and Heaven direct thy hand, to quell thy Foe ; at which Guy returning humble thanks departed, whille on the wallis all stood so to behold the Frey : No sooner was he come within call of Colbron's Camp, so was the Giant named, but he cryed aloud : Come forth presumptuous Dane, who durst so late put base affront upon Mafay; behold me English born that am come to challice thy insolence, at which the Dane rousung from his Couch whereon he was laid, came sooth, where no maner beholding Guy, but scowning, & dreadfully glared on him with his fierie eyes, and thus disdainfully began, And could the King amongst his Lordys find out no youthfuller for the Combate fit, but to send an old Man ready to drop into the Gave, who weary of his Life growes desperate, and fears not death, as knowinge by course of Nature a few moments more would put a period to his days; 'tis sure he sent thee to mock me, and make me more enraged; but be it how it will thou never shall returne alive; perhaps so laid Guy, if you can hinder it, but as wise and as strong as you, have beene mistook; contemn not Age in me, these arms and my just cause shall soon decide the busyness of the War; so saying, they charged upon each other with such force as made their rattling Harness Echo in the Skies, and fire like Lightning from each Helm shew; the Combate being dreadful to behold, bloody & doubtful, the Dane never been so matched before, wounds were receaved on both sides, whiles shoures that rent the Sky (from the Town and Danish Camp) were sent, but Guyne long till now had stood neuter, began to turn on Guy's Glistering arm, whom he had taunted never, so that with a full blow, he cutting through Colbron's Armette gave him a wound in the left shouuler, from whence the blood flowing amain, he began to faint and falter, in his stroakes, whiche Guy perceaving laid the armen, and redoubling his strenght, whilke piecemeal down his harness droppes, whereupon the Giant enrichted Guy so to desist, and seemingly let him the Conquest gain, and he woulde promote him in the Danish Army: Seel as thou art said Guy, thy fute and Coward fear are now to be despised, thinkest thou that Eng-land's Crown I'le lose unless I lose my Life; no knwoe presumptuous Man how they were mistaken at the first, & much more now at last; With that his dreadfull blad he swinge about his head whiche in the air much like a Counter he wede,

GUY Earl of WARWICK.

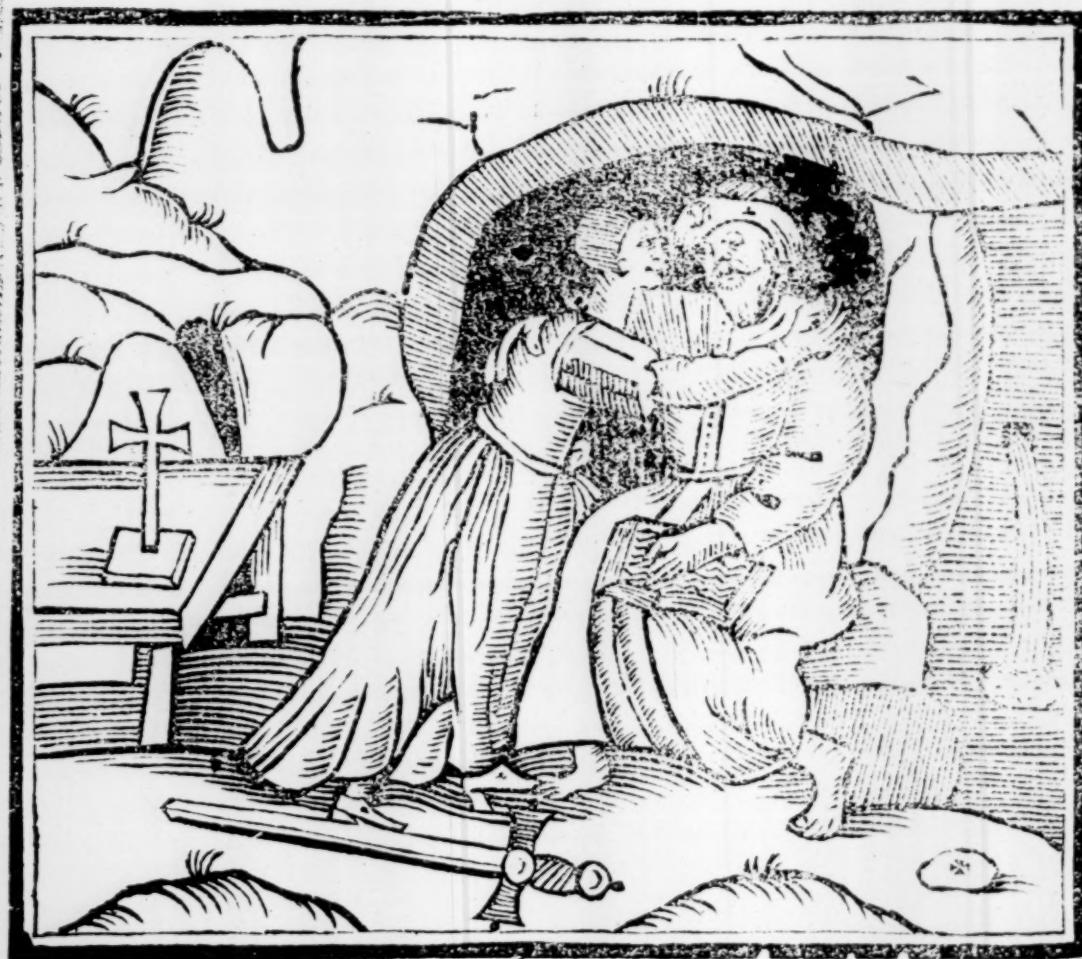

with a redoubted blow, whicheke a Thunderbolt fell on Colbrion's head, he brake his Helm and pierced so deep into his head, that slayng ten paces back he dropped upon the ground, whiche the Danes seeing, contrary to agreement, ranne running to his aid, but all too late. Sir Guy had hewed his Head off from the Monstrous Trunk, and with his Sword drove the disordered Squadron back, slaugthering them in every line, so that none durst come within the reach of a Sword, but to fall either dead or wounded or slain.

The King was in the field, perceiving in what danger he was in, he sent a thousand all that he had left, Hall, to out of the Town, and instantly came to his Reseue, chargenyg upon the Lymys with such haevyness, that he bare down all before him, whiche it is to say of their Chaypion were now givyn knyghtyd, so that chargyng through their Ranks he disordered them, and the English fighting couragiously for their Lives and Liberties, made a great slaughter : while this was doing, Guy who had retired to refresh hymself, being well mounted, returned to the Battell, cutting in pieces and destroying so terribly all that durst oppose him, that all the place where he fought, lay piled with Slain : so that having drawn out a thousand English Horse, he marching in the Front, charged through the main Body of the Enemy, whilst the King Charyng their left Wing put them to the Roar, so that numbers of their Chief Commanders and Soleiers being killed and taken Prisoners they fled towardys the Sea where their Shippynge lay, but the King and Guy resolving to clear the Land of such a Plague, pursued hard after them, not without infinite slaughter, for upon the Newes of the Overthow, all the Countries through which they fled, with such Cleappons as they could get fell upon them that of Thirtie thousand, scarce five thousand got safe to Denmark, most of the plunders they had gotten being likewise recovered, so great was the Victory that day.

After the pursuit, the King & his Army returned to Winchester, where he would have made all the splendid provision for his unknown Champion that could be imagined, but Guy refusyd it, saying he had renounced all wordly Pomp, entreating his Majestie to give him leave so to depart, the which the King would by no means consent to, till he had declared his name, against which he urged many Excuses, but seeing the King so desirous, he taking him aside, told him he was his faithful Subject Guy, & that after many & various adventures which hapned in his so long wandryng up & down the Earth, he was come to England for his Erfe, & so happily arrived as to rid his Country of its cruel Foe, entreating his Majestie not to discover his Arrival to any, not so much as to his Queen the which the King promised to obserue, & with tears embracing him after a long conference gave him Licence to depart, only binding him with promise to send hym word privately where he resided, which he afterwards did, & the King without any Attendance came often to visit him in his solitary Cave, where he lived many years.

The Famous H I S T O R Y of
So nimbly was the Warriour whose Renown,
And mighty Deeds, might justly claim a C R O W N.

CHAP. XVI. Of Phelice her behaviour for the absence of her Lord, how she came to have knowledge of him, of his and her Deaths and Burials, the description of their Tombs and Epitaph, how Guy's Sword and the Trophies of his Conquests were hung up in the Castle.

P Haēlice, not all this while having heard of her Lord, remains penitive & sad, her only Recreation being to receive the Poor, who in numbers still flock about her Gates for Alms, the which she liberally distributed with her own hand, often often enquiring of the Pilgrims that came from the Holy Land if they had heard of one Guy her much loved Lord, and they answered no : he would turn away ; w^ep concluding he was dead, and then breaking out into passionate expostion, complain of her hard Fate, which Guy himself in despite often hearing, his eyes growing thereupon full he would turn aside and w^ep to bear her company, many times receiving Alms at her hands, and resolve not to discover him self : But at last finding Clalours strength decay, and that death approaches fast, he thought fit to send the Marriage Ring according to his promise, being much desirous to behold her once more before he dyed ; so that espying a Traveller coming towards his Cave, he called to him, & out of all love desired him to do so great a favour as to carry a Ring to the Countess of Warwick, & if she requested of him to direct her to his Cave, he doubted not but she would largely reward the utmost of his demands : The man at first seemed very unwilling, as not knowing what it should mean, making many excuses, till Guy pressing more and more affirming that he meant no ill, but that the Countess would gladly receive his message ; he at last undertook it, and Posing to Warwick Castle, knocked loudly at the gate, desiring to speak with the Countess in her proper person, for such was his Commission no sooner she being come, but bowing low, he delivered her the Pledge of dear Remembrance, the which she no sooner saw but knew it and wept for joy ; and ordering her servants to give the Messenger an hundred Marks for the good tidings and went with him to the Cave where her Lord was, who espying her though feeble and weak, went out to meet her, where they embraced each other, not being able to speak for a good space, till Guy thus expressed himself.

GUY Earl of WARWICK.

Alas my Love, I see thou hast well obeyed my will in every point, with joy since my return, I oft have heard thy praises told, how vertuous and chaste thou hast remain'd and above all : took pleasure to relieve the poor, my self disguised having receaved Alms from thy hands unknown. It was I that freed England from the cruel Danes, and ever since have had my Lodging in this Cave, oft fed on Roots and drank Water from the Brook, shedding tears for true Repentance for my crying sins, and now have made my peace with Heaven ; he would have proceeded but she interrupted him, and fetching a deep sigh cryed : Ah my dear Lord, and could you be so cruel to your mourful Phelice thus long to conceal your self from her that with such earnestness enquired after you, but in vain, no news of you e're reached my longing Ear : Alas said Guy it for the welfare of my immortal Soul that I made not my self nor solitary dwelling known, nor shold I now have done (though Heaven knows I love thee above all earthly things) had not this mortal sickness seized me, and according to my promise I desired to embrace thee once before I dye, w^ep not my Love, tis but a

The Famous HISTORY of

GUY, Duke of Lancaster in France never to be separated more, this last instance did put a fit of his Disease so sore that he fell into a swoond, whereupon the King much troubling and hym a King of France in his face, with the assistance of the Cardellis, brought him to life again; then finding sayle servants, entred him in forth all manner of Leashes and would have caused for a gaol in Paris. But he wold none content to it, saying, he had chosen of the Queen (though she there to rescue his brother) which he did accordingly in two days after committing his immortal soul into the hands of his great Master, Iustice; yet sente Poissesse to call his veray Gods to dispose of them or her right fit, during which space of time he wold not leave her, but bare his white gurn in the cold Gare, and nowe perceiving his immortal Soul had taken flight, for she cried, Ah cruel Death! then wyl then let me say, as I will but tell How my dear Lord is his Creenal paace; which said, She in heigh of dres on her snowy breasts, too off her golden hair, and mangled her face, & had none greater violence had ther nor reuein'd her, then embaying the beth Corps She fel into a swoond, which her servants perceyng, conveyed her unto the body of her departed Lord in Warwick Castle: Long it was not before the fame of Guy's death (that great Champion of the World, whose equal Europe could not see beale of since or before) spread through the Land, wherupon the King & Queen left York i came to Warwick to gree oder for the Burial of so Renowned a Subject, and likewise to comfort his disconsolate Lady; but could not es-cuse the latter, for she shuld all conuersie, delighting more in solitary Darknes then in Light, refusing either meat or drinke for three days space; in the mean while Guy's Corps by the Kings order was Imbalmed and all the Castle hung with midwym to the ground, but while they were sumptuously preparing for his funeral, the Countess through extreame gret fel into a violent feaver of which in despight of al in a short space she dyed, and beathing out her Soul, cried unto my Lord with ioy I come to enjoy thy company for ever in bright Heavens for above the Starry Skies.

This renewed the sorries Grief throughout the Nation, each exclaiming against the Tyranny of Death, who had bereaved them in so short a space of the most Renowned and iure the Nation ever had, the one for Matchless Deeds in Armes, the other for matchless Beauty & Virtue.

The King gave order to Certe a spacious Monument over the Tomb designed for them, on which was carued Guy's Noble & vertue deedes with both their Lovers, lying as it were a sleep, whilste Angels strowed Reses and fragrant flowers around them, placed Garlands en their heads: The time of the Solemnity being come, all the Nobility in England in Mourning attended the Burial, the King & Queen being chief mourners; whilste the Empereur foun-

GUY Earl of WARWICK

but indeately before them, & the Pictures there Requires Some, that Edme wry labeth in the fellant Combe, & this Epitaph warndeth, &c.

EPITAPH.

Under this faceted Pile of Marble Stone
Doe lyē the Wonders of the World whom none
Could ever match, her's War and Beauti's Pride,
The far-Famed Eridgroome and his lovely Eride,
Great Mars and Venus here Entombed lyē VVhole Names immortal are and cannot Dye.

sister this, the King caused Guy's Edward with which he fought most of his deadly Battles withal, the Head of the Dragon slain in Normandy, and the Rib of the Dun Cow, with several other Trophies of his Conquest, to be hanged up in Warwick Castle as like as in City of Arret, the full proportion of the Monstrous Dragon which was about thirty foot in length; appointing a Man a yearly Salary to keep them, some of which are remaining to this day, & may be seen for the better satisfaction of the curious or incredulous of the Age, which will hardly be induced to believe that ever such Monsters were, though Scripture it self makes mention of them.

FINIS.

A Book of FORTUNE with Propheticall Solutions, Giving Satisfaction in every condition of humane Life either as it relates to Love or busines. Written in the Reign of King Henry the Eighth, and ever since carefully preserved by a Monk beyond Sea, and now brought over into England, by George Strammore Gent. Sold by P. Brooksby at his Shop at the Golden-Ball, in Pyn-Corner.